"SEC. 2. That section 1 of Title XII and all other provisions of the act entitled 'An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved June 15, 1917, which apply to section 3 of Title I thereof shall apply with equal force and effect to said section 3 as amended.

"That Title XII of the said act of June 15, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following section:

"'SEC. 4. When the United States is at war the Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or concern is using the mails in violation of any of the provisions of this act, instruct the postmaster at any post office at which mail is received addressed to such person or concern to return to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed all letters or other matter so addressed, with the words "Mail to this address undeliverable under espionage act" plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof, and all such letters or other matter so returned to such postmasters shall be by them returned to the senders thereof under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title, and agree to the same.

LEE S. OVERMAN,
DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
KNUTE NELSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. Y. WEBB,
C. C. CARLIN,
WARREN GARD,
DICK T. MORGAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Secretary to read once more the provision regarding the Postmaster General, which was the last item.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the part of the report indicated.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of the Senate the action which has been taken by the conferees in the elimination of an amendment which was passed with substantial unanimity by this body. I desire to make plain that the rule which is enunciated in many of the constitutions of the various States, which is a part of the substantive law of many other States; the rule, indeed, which has been the rule in libel cases since libel cases have been tried in our country; the rule, indeed, which has been the rule appertaining up to this particular moment to the right of free speech and the right of free publication in this land, by the elimination of the amendment which was couched in the language of many of our State constitutions, following with exactness the language of many of the substantive statutes of our States, is now for the first time repudiated by the Congress of the United States and for the first time denied expression in a proposed law.

To the concluding paragraph of the particular measure the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] offered an amendment, and that amendment, as I have before asserted, was, when the bill was before the Senate, adopted with substantial unanimity. The amendment is as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the liberty or impairing the right of any individual to publish or speak what is true, with good motives, and for justifiable ends.

It may be asserted that this amendment would be but declaratory of what the law now is; but, whether or not that be so, it constitutes no argument to the refusal of the Senate and House conferees to permit it to remain in the law. But it may well be questioned whether, in an act so drastic as this, the particular provision would inevitably apply, and if there be the slightest question about the matter—and there must be some—what harm can be done by preserving, in a measure so startlingly flexible and so far-reaching as is this measure, the right that has been the right in the United States since the United States became a Nation?

If this be what fundamentally has been ours since we have become a Republic, it ought now to be inserted in this proposed law, that there could be hereafter no question of the legitimate defense guaranteed under our law and under our Constitution.

The other day there was presented to the Military Affairs Committee and to the Senate another drastic measure. The reasons for it were asserted to be exactly the reasons that have been asserted as those essential for the passage of this measure. It was, Mr. President, with a feeling of the greatest delight, and a feeling, too, of greater security for that which I prize and that which the American people hold most dear, that I read the wise and statesmanlike letter of the President of the United States, putting upon that measure and upon the making of a military zone and martial law for all this land the stamp of his disapproval. He put that stamp of disapproval, not alone because that bill was unconstitutional but because the bill, in his opinion, was wholly unnecessary. You may assert that this particular bill, with its singular adjectives and with its lack of accurate definition, under which prosecutions of every sort may be had against every critic and every honest expression of opinion in this land, is absolutely essential for this crisis in our affairs; but, if it be absolutely essential, Mr. President, it is equally essential for the preservation of free speech in this Nation, for the preservation of honest, decent, legitimate, loyal expression, that we preserve, in connection with so drastic a law as this, the right of any man to speak the truth with good motives and for justifiable ends.

Oh, Mr. President, what a travesty, it seems to me, to-day is presented when the Congress of the United States refuses to permit the people of the Union to speak what is true, with good motives and for justifiable ends, and denies the doctrine that has been the doctrine from time immemorial in this land—denies it, indeed, by its negative action and the elimination of this amendment—denies the right which ought to be the right of every American in time of war or in time of peace to speak the truth with good motives and for justifiable ends.

I hope, Mr. President, that this particular matter, which has been stricken out by the conference, will be insisted upon by the Senate, and that this conference report for that reason will not be concurred in.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, there is nothing in this proposed law or in any law of the United States that limits the liberty or impairs the right of any individual to publish or speak what is true with good motives or with justifiable ends. Some Senator said, when this amendment was previously under consideration, that we might as well put the ten commandments into this bill.

A yea-and-nay vote was then taken on the amendment and the Senate defeated it. It was afterwards, however, put on in the Senate, as the Senator from California has stated, with practical unanimity. The reasons for the conferees striking out the amendment are better expressed by the Attorney General in the letter which I hold in my hand than I can express them, and I ask the Senate to hear what he has stated in regard to the amendment. I ask that the Secretary read the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., April 16, 1918.

Hon. EDWIN Y. WEBB,
Chairman Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: By direction of the Attorney General I respectfully call your attention to the proviso inserted in section 3, title 1, of the bill amending the espionage act, which reads as follows:

"Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the liberty or impairing the right of any individual to publish or speak what is true, with good motives, and for justifiable ends."

It is the view of this department that this proviso would very seriously interfere with the successful prosecution of cases arising under section 3 and it is the hope of the department that this proviso will be eliminated from the pending bill. In connection with this view, your attention is respectfully called to the following facts:

The experience of the department justifies the conclusion that there is far more danger to the country in pro-German propaganda than there is in mere outspoken disloyal utterances. This propaganda rarely takes the shape of open abuse of the United States or open advocacy of the cause of Germany and it is seldom, if ever, possible to prove that the propaganda has a German source, i. e., to prove that the financing of it comes from a German source. On the contrary this dangerous propaganda, of which there is a great deal in the country on its face generally shows a motive entirely legitimate. The espionage act has proved a fairly effective weapon against propaganda, and if amended as requested by the department by making attempts to obstruct enlistment possible, there is every reason to prove that it will be thoroughly effective. Its effectiveness for the purpose of killing propaganda, however, has come from the principle that motives prompting propaganda are irrelevant and that the intent of it or upon the natural and necessary effects of it. The proviso referred to would make the question of motive not only relevant but essential, and would introduce an element of proof which would greatly increase the condition of successful prosecution and greatly decrease the value of the espionage act as a deterrent of propaganda. For example, the most dangerous type of propaganda used in this country is religious pacificism, i. e., opposition to the war on the ground that it is opposed to the word of God. This is the type of propaganda which was extensively used in weakening the Italian armies. The statements used in it generally consist of quotations from the Bible and various interpretations thereof. Convictions against this type of propaganda are only possible where the motive is irrelevant and where juries can be made to infer the intent from the natural effect of the propaganda. Another class of propaganda extensively used is that of slowing down production or opposing the war on the ground that this war is one between capitalists and the proletariat. This is the type of propaganda which produced the most serious results in Russia. It contains, however, assertions of fact; on its face the motive is not treasonable, or where a treasonable motive exists it would be difficult to prove it. A third type of propaganda now apparent in the South is that effecting the status of the negro in connection with the war. Here again few facts are stated; the facts which are stated are generally true and it is difficult to disprove good motives.

There are many other types of dangerous and effective propaganda which on their face appear to be based on good motives, where proof of actual disloyal motive is very difficult to make. While the proviso referred to might have some justification if section 3 applied only to disloyal utterances, in the opinion of the department, it will prove a hindrance for prosecutions in the field of propaganda.

In view of this fact, will you not ask your committee to consider the advisability of eliminating the proviso from the pending bill?

Respectfully,

JOHN LORD O'BRIAN,
The Special Assistant to the Attorney General for War Work
(For the Attorney General).

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I think possibly the words which were referred to by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] with reference to the Ten Commandments were those uttered by myself during the discussion of this bill, when I said that I would not vote for an amendment proposing to make the Ten Commandments or the Lord's Prayer a part of the bill. I was opposed to the amendment when it was first offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], and I was very much surprised to hear the argument made by the able Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], whose legal ability we all respect very highly, when he subsequently, after this amendment had been rejected, supported it when offered again. I regret very much to be compelled to differ from the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I am not in the habit of throwing bouquets, but I hope that the Senator from California and myself can generally act together, for there is no Member of the Senate for whom I have more respect. I know that he is absolutely sincere in what he has said.

I am inclined to think, Mr. President, that the Senators who have advocated this amendment have been, as lawyers, rather inclined to view the matter from the standpoint that we ordinarily take in construing the provisions which are so common in State constitutions and in the Constitution of the United States, a list of which the Senator from Montana submitted, I think, with his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. President, the difference, as I understand it, is this: The provision in the majority of the State constitutions is one concerning either the penal offense of libel or the suit in damages for libel or slander. In peace times we only expect either damage suits or penal prosecutions for the libel of an individual. This was the great objection which was referred to and discussed so ably by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in the original discussion of this bill, to what were known as the alien and sedition laws. It possibly will be recalled by a majority of the lawyers here that Alexander Hamilton defended a man and secured a reversal of the judgment in his case who was convicted of the libel of Thomas Jefferson, in what is known, I believe, as the Brooks case.

Mr. President, it is perfectly proper that in times of peace the constitutional provision should be strictly observed with reference to the submission of proof by the defendant either in a damage suit for libel or slander or even in a penal proceeding for libeling an individual. It is perfectly proper that the constitutional protection should be thrown around him, that he may prove or may present the truth of the statement as a defense; it is perfectly proper that that rule and those constitutional provisions shall be strictly observed. This is the reason for and this is the purpose of the constitutional provisions, as demonstrated by the decisions along the line of libel of the individual. Every decision which you will read covering this subject is based upon the question of libel or slander, either the prevention of libel by the enforcement of a penal statute or else allowing the individual to prove the truth when he is sued in damages for libel or tried in the criminal case.

This is an entirely different case which we are now considering. It does not relate to the libel of the individual. This matter was discussed concerning the mistaken impression which has gotten out to the public that this proposed law prohibited or penalized the expression of criticism against an individual, such even as the President of the United States; and it was shown here in the debate, as of course we all remember, that there was nothing of that character in the bill. This proposed act does not cover actions for libel; it covers forcible attacks by words or acts on the United States Government, or upon the uniform of its soldiers, or upon its flag. It is not a libel.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FALL. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. FRANCE. I am not an attorney at law, but I was under the impression that a government might be libeled, as an individual may be libeled. I was under that impression, gained from a very cursory examination of some of these decisions.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I presumed that that was the impression under which the Senator from Maryland was laboring. That may be possible.

It was well said by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] yesterday that war is not made by the declaration of war. The declaration of war is simply the declaration of a status. The status has changed from a peace status to a war status. This bill is dealing with war. It is not intended to reach the peace status, nor to apply to the peace status. The libel even of the Government, to which the Senator refers—if such a thing is provided—is the libel of the Government in time of peace. This is to prevent the use of words constituting an assault upon the Government, or its integrity, or upon its soldiers, or upon its uniform, tending to bring it into contempt in time of war. The distinction is so plain that a man who runs may understand it.

In my judgment, the Assistant Attorney General was absolutely correct. You are dealing with war matters. You can not throw around the individual the cloak of innocence which is his sufficient shield and protection in a criminal action against him where he is tried by a jury of 12 men in times of peace. If you undertake to surround him with the affirmative defensive which he is allowed in times of peace when he is attacking your Government in time of war, in my judgment, Senators, you are then necessitating the passage of the bill introduced by the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

My position may have been misunderstood; it may be possible that I am so unfortunate as not to be able to explain myself as I desire to the Senate. From the inception of this entire legislation, from the first discussion of the espionage bill down to the present time, I have attempted to be consistent in following out one line. Prior to the declaration of war, when the President declared armed neutrality and asked us to grant him certain powers—when he asked the passage of the espionage acts prior to the declaration of war—I took the position then, and I take it now, that without drastic legislation of a penal character you will inevitably bring about in this country exactly the conditions which during the Civil War resulted in the arrest by military authority of members of the Maryland Legislature; when by order of the President a writ of habeas corpus to release them from arrest was refused; when it became necessary, in the judgment of Abraham Lincoln, to arrest the mayor of Baltimore under a military warrant; when, as I said, he had arrested by military warrant members of the legislature to prevent them from declaring secession and carrying Maryland into the Southern Confederacy; when it became necessary by military warrant not only to arrest a newsboy, but absolutely to stop the circulation of a paper in New York, where martial law was not declared; when it became necessary to reach out with the strong hand of the military and seize editors of papers, to convict before a military tribunal Vallandigham in Ohio, martial law not being declared; when the Constitution of the United States, in my judgment, was absolutely violated, because Abraham Lincoln—whom you certainly recognize as a patriot, only desirous of saving this country—was ready to take the responsibility and to save it, despite any criticism which might be directed at him, and even to violate the Constitution and take the consequences, if in his judgment it was necessary to violate it, that this country might live.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is it not rather a misuse of terms to speak of such acts as the Senator has so eloquently referred to as a violation of the Constitution? Is it not rather the exercise of war powers, necessary for the preservation of the Union, which are contained in the Constitution?

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly, Mr. President; and, as I was going to say, correcting my remarks, having these matters in view—viewing this entire situation as I do—I have consistently labored here to allow a man charged with an offense at this time to be tried by a jury of his countrymen in the civil courts, that it might not be necessary, in order to save this Government and these people of ours, to invoke the strong arm of the military. Therefore I voted for every drastic measure to punish spying, to punish any attack, direct or indirect, upon our Government, upon its soldiers, upon its flag, upon its uniform; to punish it drastically, but to leave the question of guilt or innocence to the civil tribunals and not necessitate the arrest and trial of individuals throughout this country by the military arm of the Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator this question, as a practical matter: In the case of offenses against this statute, with such a provision in it as was put in by the Senate, would it not operate in this way—that practically every offender would come into court with a plea that what he had said or published or done was true, and for justifiable motives, and that would at once inject into the trial that issue, upon which the offender would have unlimited opportunity to exploit his views, and more harm probably would come from trials of that sort than from the original offense?

Mr. FALL. Why, clearly, Mr. President; that is my opinion, considering the further fact that the Senate, in its wisdom, saw fit to change the word "calculated" to the word "intended." If you adopt this measure now as it went from the Senate to the House, you are not only face to face with the necessity of proving the intent, but you allow the defendant, in defense, to prove the truth of his words. Therefore, if he proves that the words which he uttered were true, the court will say that he must have been presumed to intend a benefit rather than an attack upon the Government of the United States or an offense against it. You have thrown around him now, in my judgment, such defenses as will render it exceeding difficult, even without this amendment of the Senator from Maryland, to secure a conviction. With this amendment, such conviction, in my judgment, is almost impossible. Then you are confronted by a condition. It is no theory. The Senator from Oregon—and I may say the courageous, brave, and sincere Senator from Oregon—has introduced and has now pending before his committee a proposed law providing for the trial of cases of this kind before a military tribunal. I join, in opposition to the enactment of such legislation, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the other Senators who have expressed themselves. You pass this legislation as it went from this body, you enact this law as we sent it to the House, and I tell you again, as I have warned you before, that inevitably, to protect this country, to save it in this hour of its dire need, you must vest in the military tribunals the power to stop what? Treason. It is all treason. You will realize it before you have gone much farther.

Unfortunately, the Constitution of the United States undertakes to prescribe what shall be treason, and the definition is so restricted that it is almost impossible to reach cases which are intended to be reached and which are offensive to every true American now, and which are arising every day in all the different States of the Union. It is almost impossible to reach them and to punish them as treasonable. It is not our fault, but it is because the Constitution has limited the definition which the legislation might put upon what constituted treason. There are acts treasonable in themselves. I say that any man who is guilty of language tending to cast contempt upon or to bring into contempt the land or naval forces of the United States, the flag of the United States, the uniform of the United States, or the form of government of the United States in time of war, should be guilty and is guilty as a matter of fact of treason; but under the limitations of the Constitution you can not convict him of treason. You must prove that the act was in aid of the enemy, and was so intended, or else you can not convict him of treason.

Insidiously, from one end of this country to the other, secretly, in lodge rooms throughout the different States of this Union to-day treason is being preached. I have reference to the Industrial Workers of the World and their associates. Resistance to the draft is, in my judgment, treason to the United States at this time. Resistance to any of its measures should, in my judgment, be denominated treason, and in a great many of the cases of which we have heard and read and some of which have come under the knowledge of each of us, the parties have escaped, although in their intentions they were guilty of treason; and you now, in enacting legislation here allowing a man to go before a jury and be tried by a civil tribunal, are casting around him all the protections which the courts give to a man charged with crime in times of peace.

Why, I have heard it said here that it is better that a hundred guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should be convicted. I say to you that if it is necessary to save this country it is better that 10 innocent men should sacrifice their blood than that the country itself should not be saved. That is harsh doctrine, but war is harsh. You can not play with conditions as they exist now with silk gloves. You must meet these enemies of this country at home with the bars of a jail or else you are going to be compelled to meet them with the rope of Judge Lynch or with muzzles of your guns after a drumhead court-martial.

Mr. President, I have been earnestly, insistently contending for civil trials, for jury trials to prevent what I see will inevitably, in my judgment, be the measure to which we must resort to save the country. Emasculate proposed legislation of this kind, and I, for one, pledge the honorable Senator from Oregon my vote and my support for his measure proposing trial by military tribunal.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the scope of the argument, I think, has demonstrated conclusively the necessity for the amendment. I beg the attention of my colleagues while I respond for just a few moments to what has been said in behalf of the action of the conferees in striking out this amendment. I beg their attention, because what confronts us now in this amendment is fundamental and it touches not only us and our action at this particular time but it touches as well that which is held most dear by all our people.

As premising what I have to say, I want to make it perfectly clear—and this, I think, has been made plain by my past actions—that there is not anything that the Senator from North Carolina or the Senator from New Mexico can present for the successful prosecution of this war that will not have not only my enthusiastic support but my ardent advocacy in and out of this Chamber. I want to make plain again, too, that disloyalty to the Nation in this crisis, propaganda that will destroy the morale of those whom we love abroad or those at home who fight behind the line would be by me as condignly met as any conceivable offense against our people or against our fighting forces; but I must most respectfully dissent from the doctrine that has been announced by the learned Senator from North Carolina and that which has been reiterated by the Senator from New Mexico.

The Senator from North Carolina says to us, first, that you might just as well insert in this bill the Ten Commandments, or some equally obvious matter, as this particular amendment. Now, follow me, please. First, it is asserted that you might just as well insert in this bill some utterly immaterial matter or some obvious matter as the amendment for which we contend; and in the very next breath these Senators contend—and that contention they demonstrate by the letter of some gentleman connected with the Attorney General's Office—that the insertion of this amendment would give to men charged with an offense the defense that the Constitution of the United States is supposed to give to every man charged with crime; and, forsooth, because this amendment would give to a man charged with an offense under this bill what the Constitution guarantees him and what the law has ever given him in kindred and in cognate actions, for that very reason it is said that it should be eliminated from this bill.

Now, that is the sum and the substance of the argument presented by the Assistant Attorney General. He says that certain people quote the Bible in a particularly inappropriate way, and in that fashion indulge a propaganda that ought not to be tolerated. If the Bible be quoted in a fashion that it ought not to be quoted, of course, we would prohibit it, I assume, in this time of hysteria.

But, Mr. President, I can not assent to the doctrine so eloquently enunciated by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] that this is war, and because it is war, a different rule must obtain in relation to the prosecution of criminal offenses than obtains in time of peace. Yes, Mr. President, it is war. It is war from the standpoint of many of us here upon a ruthless enemy until victory shall be won for the United States of America. But, good God, Mr. President, when did it become war upon the American people? When in all this crisis and in all this peril did we have in this conflict war upon the American people so that the safeguards of the Constitution and the rights of the law should be denied unto the American people?

The doctrine that has been enunciated here by the distinguished Senators, for whom I have not only a profound respect and regard but of whose views I speak with peculiar diffidence, means that you are warring not upon an enemy, you are warring upon your own people, and you are denying that which has been given them ever since this Nation was established. The argument that has been made here to-day that in time of war you deny the presumption of innocence in civil courts to men charged with offenses, the argument that in time of war the safeguards that are around a man accused of crime are shorn from him and taken from him, the argument that in time of war substantially the Constitution is abrogated, and the protection of the law denied to the American citizen is an argument, Mr. President, to which I can not subscribe, and to which this popular branch of the Government of the United States of America ought never to subscribe, and it is an argument, I am very glad to say, that has been repudiated by the President of the United States in the letter that he wrote day before yesterday concerning the bill, which was designed to apply martial law to the entire Union.

I submit, therefore, in view of what has been said by the Senator from North Carolina, I submit in view of the very letter and because of the very reasons that are given by the Assistant Attorney General, this particular clause should be inserted in this bill, and that the bill should be sent back to conference with the direction to the conferees of this body to insert that particular clause.

Mr. SHERMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. I do not want to lose the floor, however.

Mr. OVERMAN. This hour was intended to be given to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to bring up the housing bill. Some Senators have said that they would like to read the letter of the Assistant Attorney General before voting on the conference report. Therefore I ask that the report may go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. Until what time?

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that agreeable to the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Senator from Illinois desires to know to what hour the Senator from North Carolina wishes to have the conference report go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. Just temporarily lay it aside, in order that at some other time, when the Senate is not pressed, it may be taken up. I should like to have the housing bill passed to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator expect to call up the conference report to-day?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the presentation of reports of committees.

Mr. OVERMAN. The regular order is that the conference report goes over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to its going over until to-morrow.

Mr. FRANCE. I understand that the report had been presented and it is now under discussion.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Virginia wants to bring up the housing bill, and I am willing to have it go over and to take up the housing bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that, upon the request of the Senator from North Carolina, the conference report will lie upon the table to be called up at a later time. Reports of committees are still in order.

THE OXMAN TRIAL.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, out of order, somewhat in the nature of a personal explanation, I wish to say that on yesterday the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] interrogated the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] as to a statement which had been made by myself on a preceding day to the effect that in the proceedings growing out of the trial of Thomas J. Mooney in San Francisco one Oxman, a witness in that case, who later on had been charged with subornation of perjury, had been presented to a grand jury, and that the grand jury had declined to return a true bill against him, whereas the Senator from California stated that Oxman had been tried before a petty jury and acquitted. The Senator from Ohio asked me to state for the RECORD, on account of a certain public interest which he has in the case, what the fact is in that regard.

I desire to state that both the statement made by the Senator from California as to Oxman and the statement made by myself were correct; that Oxman was presented to the grand jury, and the grand jury did decline to return a true bill against him. Subsequently he was presented upon complaint to a justice of the peace sitting as a committing magistrate, and the justice of the peace bound him over to the superior court, and he was tried upon a finding of probable cause by the justice of the peace.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask what the regular order is.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am asking to present, as a matter of correction or explanation, a personal statement as to a fact. If the Senator has no objection, it will take me just a moment.

Oxman was tried before the petty jury and was acquitted. So there is no inaccuracy in either one of the statements.

In further reference to that matter, Mr. President, I ask leave to present to the Senate and to send to the desk and have read by the Secretary a brief telegram which I have just received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator will be granted, and the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 23, 1918.

Senator POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

All good citizens of California are indebted to you for your defense of the administration of the law in our State. Only radicals, anarchists, near anarchists, and Bolsheviki, and those misled by them have any views other than yours, and they have purposely seized upon the Mooney case as a new instrument with which to break down the faith of the country in law and order, the old forms of sedition and anarchy having been crushed before an awakened public opinion. Don't be fooled by the Oxman camouflage. The case of Billings, the first of these cases tried, was tried and Billings was convicted in my court before ever Oxman was heard of. The same evidence was later produced against Mooney in another court, supplemented by Oxman's testimony, and Mooney was convicted. However, the conviction did not come until large sums of money had been raised and a pitiless campaign started to break by publicity and terrorism all witnesses for the State. Like the Germans striking at the strongest point as their best defensive, the Mooney defense picked upon Oxman's testimony as their greatest danger point and fired at it with every kind of poisoned gas that a well-financed and a well-organized campaign of publicity could devise. When out of that campaign Oxman was charged with suborning perjury, he was placed on trial before a jury drawn in the usual court routine and acquitted. That there might be no good ground for charging that Oxman was not fairly prosecuted I, as trial judge, caused the district attorney to retire and place the prosecution in the hands of the attorney general of the State, Deputies Raymond Benjamin and John T. Nourse conducting the case. Nourse has since been appointed a judge of the superior court. It is admitted in printed statements issued here by the Mooney defense league that the defense has collected from organizations requiring receipts more than $100,000. It is reported that at least another one hundred thousand has been collected from sources which did not ask for receipts. All this money has been expended in publicity and in fees for detectives and lawyers. You will do the country a great service by following these cases and exposing their use by the radicals in office and out, to foment discontent, sedition, and destruction of Government; and don't let the report of Frankfurter fool you. It was made on false reasoning, without investigation, and in total disregard of the rights of California as a sovereign State. I say without investigation, for Frankfurter did not interview me, who presided at the trials of Billings and Oxman, nor Judge Emmett Seawell, who presided at the trials of Weinberg and Mrs. Mooney, and, as far as I know, did not consult with the district attorney nor with any other officer representing the State.

FRANK H. DUNNE,
Judge of the Superior Court.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senate will bear with me for a moment I should like to add in connection with the telegram read the fact that the district attorney for the county and city of San Francisco went through the process of recall on this issue and in the ensuing election the district attorney who prosecuted this case, resulting in the sentence referred to—Charles M. Fickert—was sustained by the county and city of San Francisco by an overwhelming majority—more than 2 to 1, as I remember, quoting from memory. Public sentiment is in no uncertain state, according to this recall, in San Francisco.

RULES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Mr. OWEN. I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD Senate joint resolution 150, which I introduced yesterday, and to give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business, I shall ask permission to address the Senate in regard to it.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 150) requesting the President to invite the entente allies to declare the rules of international law and require the German Government to accept such rules under penalty of progressive international boycott, etc.

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby requested to invite Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan and their allies in the present war brought upon them by the Hohenzollerns, to enter into a treaty declaring the fundamental rules of international relationship and to bring to the knowledge of the commercial and financial interests now backing the Hohenzollern war that instead of profit out of this war they shall be visited with assured commercial and financial loss unless they promptly use their influences to bring this war to an end by the acceptance of the rules of international law.

SEC. 2. That the fundamental principles of international relationship and of international law upon which the future peace of the world must depend are as follows:

Every civilized nation has the unquestionable right to exercise full powers of internal self-government, with exclusive control within its own territory over emigration, immigration, exports, and imports, and to complete unembarrassed territorial integrity, but no right to menace other nations by militarism.

That the oceans and high seas and international waterways should be free and open under international rules to the citizens of all nations recognizing international law.

That the right of access to the sea by shipment in bond without tax through intervening territory should be conceded to all nations recognizing international law.

That all international differences should be definitely and finally settled by arbitration, but no case questioning the fundamental rules of international law is justifiable.

That the invasion of the territorial integrity of one nation by another on any alleged ground is the highest of all international crimes, and any nation offending this law should be regarded by all civilized nations as an international outlaw.

That subordinate nations or colonies, backward in education and industrial and economic development, should have their human rights safeguarded on the basis of the principles of freedom and justice by international agreement.

That Alsace-Lorraine and the Terra Irredenta should be assured unembarrassed self-determination under international agreement.

That Germany and Austria must immediately, under the rules of international law, evacuate all territory invaded by them during the present war.

That progressive reciprocal disarmament of the nations shall be agreed upon as an international rule of conduct to go into effect immediately after the termination of this war to an agreed basis of actual requirements for domestic and international police.

That an international police army and navy shall be established by international agreement after the termination of this war for the purpose of enforcing international rules.

SEC. 3. That in order to remove the hope of profit and to establish the certainty of loss upon the commercial and financial forces now backing the German military machine in this war, that the international agreement hereinbefore proposed shall further stipulate that if within 30 days after such international agreement be signed the German Government shall not by resolution of the Reichstag and by referendum of the German people agree to the above principles of international law, then and in that event the nations of the world now at war with Germany should solemnly pledge themselves by an irrevocable agreement to enforce the following commercial and financial stipulations for one year's time, with one additional year's time for every 30 days' further delay on the part of the German Government up to the term of five years and until the Government of Germany accepts the proposed principles of international law, as follows:

STIPULATIONS OF BOYCOTT.

First. To refuse clearance to any of their vessels to any German port.

Second. To refuse entry to any of their ports of any vessel under the flag of Germany or a vessel under any other flag engaged directly or indirectly in trade with Germany or owned in whole or in part by any subject of Germany.

Third. To prohibit the exportation, direct or indirect, of any merchandise, goods, wares, raw materials, or other natural products, whether of domestic or foreign origin, to Germany.

Fourth. To refuse to permit the importation, direct or indirect, of any merchandise, goods, or wares, whether of domestic or foreign origin, from Germany.

Fifth. To prohibit the exportation, direct or indirect, to Germany of coin, bullion, or paper money, or securities, or any other form of indebtedness, or bills of exchange, or of other negotiable instruments, or of banking or commercial paper.

Sixth. To forbid any postal, telegraphic or telephonic, or express communication with Germany or with any person in Germany.

Seventh. To prohibit the transfer to their own nationals, either directly or indirectly, of any stocks, shares, mortgages, or other forms of indebtedness owned by a resident subject of Germany, and to confiscate all property, including patents and patent rights, owned in the entente allied countries by Germans residing in Germany and use the same or the proceeds thereof as an indemnity to their own nationals owning property lost or confiscated in Germany.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is not closed yet.

Mr. THOMPSON. I insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are still in order. If there be none, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4428) to amend section 272 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 4429) granting a pension to Eliza Kelley (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4430) granting an increase of pension to Clinton Neligh (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4431) granting an increase of pension to William McCory (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4432) granting an increase of pension to Anderson Ward (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4433) granting an increase of pension to James Anderson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4434) granting an increase of pension to James Ellis (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. DILLINGHAM:

A bill (S. 4435) granting a pension to William H. Davis (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of California:

A bill (S. 4436) to restore Maj. Robert H. Peck, of the Regular Army, to the place in the lineal list he would have occupied had he not been separated from the service; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WATSON submitted an amendment relative to the compensation of postal employees, intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR STONE.

Mr. REED submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 231), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE, late a Senator from the State of Missouri, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the foregoing resolution, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 10613. An act to provide for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse of the District of Columbia, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

COST OF FARM IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to call up Senate resolution 223, coming over under the rule from a previous day.

Mr. SWANSON. Is it on the calendar?

Mr. THOMPSON. No, sir; it comes over under the rule from a previous day. It is a short matter and I think will not require much discussion at this time, as the subject has been thoroughly considered in connection with other bills. It simply directs the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the high cost of farming implements and some articles that the farmer is required to buy, in order to establish a proper equilibrium of prices. An arbitrary price having been fixed on wheat, the farmers insist that if that price shall remain a reasonable price should be fixed upon farm implements and things they are required to buy and use on the farm to bring about production.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the resolution, which has come over from a previous day.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator will not present that resolution to-day.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask what has become of the motion of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not press his resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not entertain the motion of the Senator from Virginia because the morning business had not been concluded.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Am I wrong in thinking that a motion to take up a bill is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not during the morning business without unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is in order after the hour of 1 o'clock. Under our rules it was in order when the Senator from Virginia made the motion.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think that there will be any lengthy discussion on my resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand the motion is pending and unacted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that during the morning business it can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the rule says after 1 o'clock such a motion can be entertained.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is in order after the conclusion of morning business, or after the hour of 1 o'clock. The rule is specific.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. However, the Chair has recognized the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator will not press his resolution. It can come up at some other time. This housing bill has been here for two weeks. The department says it is the most urgent war matter pending here to-day. For two weeks I have been trying to get consideration of this measure.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not my desire to interfere at all with any war measure. As a matter of fact this resolution relates to the question of production and is a war measure in itself. It applies to what is most vital and important to the country at this time—the production of foodstuffs for ourselves and the allied armies—and in order to maintain the necessary increased production I insist that the prices on the things the farmer has to buy to bring about production should also be regulated in order to do justice to the farmer when prices are fixed on his products. The farmer is like any other business man. In order to stay in business he must make a fair profit, and there is no way of determining what the price on his products should be without knowing the cost of production.

Mr. SWANSON. I favor the resolution of the Senator and will vote for it, for I want the information, but I insist on the motion that I made before he was recognized. I ask the Chair to rule whether my motion is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After further information which has been conveyed to the Chair as to the rule referred to, the Chair holds that the motion made by the Senator from Virginia is in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. THOMPSON. In view of the ruling of the Chair I should like to know then if my resolution will go over under the rule without prejudice and can be called up at some later day when it can be reached during the morning hour?

Mr. SWANSON. It can go over without prejudice, as it has not been brought up.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would not want it to go to the calendar.

Mr. SWANSON. It does not go to the calendar, because it has not been brought up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the resolution would go over without prejudice.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; without prejudice.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 10265.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer an amendment to subdivision (b), section 1, of the bill, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator from Minnesota that there is an amendment now pending to the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was not aware of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is that offered by Mr. THOMAS to amend the amendment of the committee on page 2 by striking out all of the proposed amendment after the word "That," on line 15, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Schools, colleges, museums, libraries, State, county, and municipal buildings shall be exempted from the operations of this act.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has an amendment which he has submitted to me, which covers the ground intended to be covered by the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota may be read as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

The SECRETARY. After the word "constructed," in line 15, page 2, it is proposed to strike out the entire proviso down to and including line 24, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That colleges, museums, libraries, State or municipal buildings, and the furnishings of private dwellings shall not be acquired except by contract, nor shall any occupied dwelling be taken under the powers in this act given, except by contract, unless the necessity thereof shall be determined by a judge of the circuit or district court of the United States exercising jurisdiction in the locality on petition setting forth the reason and necessity for such taking; the hearing on such petition shall be summary in character and the determination of such judge shall be final.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I move that that amendment be accepted as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves that the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota be accepted as a substitute.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Virginia ought not to move that that be done. The question is upon substituting.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the substitute as offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] would be perfectly satisfactory to me, but the principal objection which I have to this proviso is not met at all by the substitute. I regard it as a little camouflage. The taking of an occupied private dwelling is not to be by the Secretary of Labor under the provisions of the amendment, even as left in the substitute of the Senator from Minnesota. It is not to be by the individual act of the Secretary, but by the act of some judge of a district or circuit court. Such judge is simply substituted for the Secretary of Labor, with the same power. I do not think that portion of the amendment has been changed.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. That portion of the amendment was not changed. The other day when this amendment was under consideration it was objected to for the reason that it only provided that the furnishings of dwelling, colleges, museums, libraries, State and municipal buildings could be acquired by contract. It was the intention, undoubtedly, that libraries, museums, State and municipal buildings could not be acquired except by contract. This amendment was drawn in order to make it perfectly clear that the furnishings, and not only the furnishings but that colleges, museums, libraries, State or municipal buildings could only be acquired by contract.

Mr. FALL. I agree with that part of the amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. The chairman of the committee was not willing that private dwellings should be placed in the same category. It is going a long way to say that a dwelling shall be taken from one person and given to another for the same use.

Mr. FALL. By one person.

Mr. KELLOGG. But the amendment was not drawn with a view of affecting the question of dwellings at all.

Mr. FALL. I so understood; and for that reason I said that I was in accord with the Senator's idea and in favor of his amendment, but that it did not reach the principal objection which I make to this entire proviso; that is, I object, Mr. President, most seriously to the Secretary of Labor being entitled, of his own volition and upon his own judgment of the necessity of the case, to requisition or commandeer a private occupied dwelling. That objection is not removed by the simple substitution of a judge. Apparently, on the face of it, this would look as though it contemplated a condemnation proceeding, but it does not.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it is contemplated in some of the arsenals and navy yards to erect buildings to house two or three thousand people. There might be 8 or 10 residences there, and if we did not have the right here conferred it might absolutely interfere with the whole program, and afford an opportunity to blackmail the Government and charge ten or twenty times what the property is worth. If it is a public necessity, and if it is absolutely for the public good that such property shall be taken, it is not left to the Secretary of Labor, but he will have to file a petition with the circuit or district judge, who must enter of record that the public necessity requires the taking of this private property. After that is done, then he can proceed.

Mr. FALL. I understand that; but the objection I make to it is that it simply substitutes the single opinion of a judge without condemnation proceedings of any kind for the sole opinion of the Secretary of Labor in this matter.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I hope the Senator from Virginia will pardon me and let me finish my statement. The hearing is not really a hearing. There is no provision for a day in court. The party whose private property is taken or commandeered has not an opportunity to be heard. The hearing before the judge is not upon petition and answer thereto; it is not upon evidence taken as to the necessity of taking the property, but it is simply upon the filing of the petition of the Secretary of Labor himself that he sees the necessity for the taking of a particular house. Upon the single indorsement of that petition or opinion of the Secretary of Labor by the judge himself an occupied dwelling can be taken away from the occupant.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FALL. I first yield to the Senator having charge of the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say that a public building may be erected in war times or in peace, and that the Government has the power of condemnation.

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SWANSON. A great many people have the idea that, if that power be conferred in this case, it may work an injustice to some people. So this amendment was drawn and it has been offered by the Senator from Delaware. It was written hurriedly, and provides that the necessity for the taking of the property must be decided by a judge before it can be taken. After that condemnation proceedings may be had or the owner may be paid 75 per cent of the value of the property. On petition the judge determines as to the necessity of the taking before anything can be done to a private dwelling.

Mr. LODGE. But that ought not to be an ex parte hearing.

Mr. SWANSON. Speed, speed, speed, is what is needed in this matter. If there are going to be so many delays placed around this proceeding by such cumbersome processes before anything can be done, there is absolutely no use of passing the bill.

Mr. FALL. I am sorry for that, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. If the building of a little town containing three or four thousand people is to be so delayed that it will require 12 or 18 months before it can be done, the war will be over, I hope, before the necessity for such work arises. The amendment, however, was reported to give every man a day in court; and it is not necessary to pass upon the public necessity even before the condemnation proceedings may be had.

Mr. LODGE. But, if the Senator will allow me, that is the trouble; it is not a court.

Mr. FALL. It is not a court at all. That is the objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. I will yield to the Senator from Delaware, who, I understand, is the author of the amendment.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I desire to correct an impression which has been given out in regard to my being the author of the whole amendment. My amendment, which was offered in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, was to provide that furnishings in a private dwelling and private dwellings themselves should not be taken by the Secretary of Labor until he had submitted his reasons for taking them to a judge and the judge had determined the necessity thereof.

I heard a good deal of discussion the other day in the Senate about lawyers and about the capacity of lawyers, and things of that kind, but I was called out before I was charged with being the author of this whole amendment. It is perfectly familiar hornbook law that, although a proceeding may be ex parte, yet a judge will admit parties to the hearing and will listen to their representations. I have been through many condemnation proceedings, and that has frequently occurred. The usual condemnation proceeding is, of course, for the judge to appoint a commission to condemn; and, while that may be ex parte, it is not of necessity.

No judge in the United States of America, I fancy, would refuse a hearing to a person owning a private dwelling in which he lived if the Secretary of Labor desired to take it. I think it may be very necessary, if this operation is necessary at all, that the Secretary of Labor be authorized to take private dwellings. For example, there might be a tract of a hundred acres on which there might be one private dwelling which would very greatly interfere with the covering of that whole hundred acres with buildings. I fancy a judge would decide that that was a case of necessity, but he would hear the man who was the owner, not necessarily but out of grace, even if the proceeding might be ex parte, under certain circumstances. It might, however, be an extremely difficult matter to give a hearing to every person entitled to a remote interest or a fractional interest in a portion of the land to be taken in connection with a whole enterprise of this kind before a final determination. So a summary proceeding is needed and for that reason was provided.

Personally I do not see any objection to taking college buildings. I might even go so far as to shock the sense of some of my colleagues by saying that the best use that I know of to which the buildings of Harvard College or Yale College or the University of Pennsylvania or my own college, the University of Virginia, could be put from now until we have supplied ourselves with all the munitions and the necessities of war would be to house workmen in them if they could not be housed elsewhere. No Secretary of Labor would, however, attempt to take such buildings as those unless it was absolutely necessary to do so. I have no objection to a court having that matter under consideration, but that is not a portion of my amendment. I have had nothing to do with anything except the furnishings and the taking of private dwellings, but I thought that it was very desirable and, indeed, necessary that some provision along the line of the amendment I suggested should be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator probably was not present when I stated that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] offered the amendment in connection with schools and colleges.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes; and I voted against that, so that I do not care to be responsible for the whole amendment, because I can think of circumstances when, indeed, it would be very desirable to take college buildings. There is not much use in educating the young men of this country to be dominated by Huns, as I see it. I want this war won, and I want every person in this country to be engaged in useful war work. It is not so necessary that our colleges shall run for a few months as it is necessary that we should get work done which is necessary for the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

Mr. FALL. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to make an inquiry with regard to the parliamentary situation. When this bill was last before the Senate, I think on the 17th of April, just before adjournment I offered an amendment to strike out all of subsection (b) after the word "That" in line 15, and to insert in place thereof the words "schools, colleges, museums, libraries, State, county, and municipal buildings shall be exempted from the operations of this act." The Senator having charge of the bill said:

I shall be very glad to accept that amendment.

I think that was the parliamentary situation at the time the bill went over, and my purpose in interrupting is to ask whether that amendment is now before the Senate?

Mr. SWANSON. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator that that amendment is before the Senate, but the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has offered as a substitute, as the Chair is advised, an amendment which has been read to the Senate.

Mr. FALL. And I am discussing the amendment, the proposed substitute, and the subject generally.

Mr. THOMAS. I came into the Chamber after the discussion began, and was not aware of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. FALL. I yield now to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I desire to make this suggestion to the Senator from New Mexico and to the chairman of the committee, that after the word "be" in the line next to the last to strike out the words "summary in character" and insert "upon notice to the owner and occupant of such dwellings, and the determination of such judge shall be final." That would insure a hearing to the owner and the occupant of the dwelling.

Mr. FALL. "Shall be after notice and upon hearing"——

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator will propose an amendment of that kind, so far as I am concerned I will have no objection to it.

Mr. FALL. I am simply voicing my objection. I have not undertaken to construct an amendment, because I think that I shall likely vote against the entire bill. I certainly shall do so unless there are other amendments adopted to it.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator will permit me, I will propose an amendment to the amendment to read as follows:

And hearing on such petition shall be upon notice to the owner and occupant of such dwelling, and the determination of such judge shall be final.

If that is satisfactory to the chairman of the committee I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. SWANSON. I will be glad to accept that.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will ask to have the amendment agreed to in that form.

Mr. FALL. I think it would be better to say "the determination of such judge, after hearing, shall be final."

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to putting in the words "after hearing."

Mr. FALL. Let the words "after hearing" be inserted.

Mr. SWANSON. Very well.

Mr. FALL. That, I think, properly safeguards it, although the Senator understands that this is in no sense a condemnation proceeding. I wish to refer to the observations of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] on this subject. I have no more confidence in a judge acting upon a business matter in a summary way than I would have in any other individual. I would submit a legal proposition to him and of course, having respect for his learning and for his position, would accept his legal decision more readily than I would that of a layman; but as to the simple necessity for public use or for governmental use of a certain dwelling house, I would have no more confidence in his individual decision than I would have in that of the Secretary of Labor, except for certain reasons which I shall give utterance to hereafter with reference to the Secretary of Labor, but I mean than of any other individual, because he will not be acting in a legal capacity unless the amendments which have been offered are adopted, and then he will be; and, while the hearing will yet not be in the nature of a condemnation, it will at least give the judge sitting an opportunity to hear business or other reasons against the confiscation of the property.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the Senator of course recognizes the desirability of having a forum into which an owner may go to show that the reasons given by the Secretary of Labor, who would be an advocate of the taking, are not sound.

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. To protect the property for his own use.

Mr. FALL. That was my object in objecting to the provision as it was originally drawn.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will allow me a moment, of course he understands, and every other Senator understands, that our Anglo-Saxon civilization is built upon the theory that every man's home is his castle. This is an interference with the private, occupied dwelling house of a man. Practically all the internal wars of our forefathers were fought out to establish this very principle, that a man's home is his castle, and that his fireside should be inviolate.

This provision, as it originally stood, would turn over to the Secretary of Labor the right on 10 days' notice to eject the individual from his private occupied dwelling or his farm or other property in the United States. It is not confined in any way. These provisions must be construed with reference to the other laws in pari materia, which we have been discussing and have been passing and the definitions which have been given of war necessities. This bill contains the broad statement that it is designed to provide housing for workmen engaged in "industries connected with and essential to the national defense"; and you will find the legislation of the Congress of the United States has said that every industry is essential to the national defense—I can not recall an industry to-day carried on in the United States which, directly or indirectly, in one act or another has not been declared by this body as essential to the national defense. The consequence is that, under the broad terms of this provision, the Secretary of Labor can go to the home of the Senator from Delaware and eject him from his occupied dwelling. Now, under the amendment offered by the committee he must, before doing so, state just why he desires that property and get the order confirmed by the judge, or get his petition approved by the judge. Under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, with the further amendment which, as I understand is accepted, while still this is not a condemnation proceeding such as any American citizen or a person of Anglo-Saxon blood should be entitled to before his home is violated, yet it will at least give him an opportunity to appear before that judge and present reasons why his house should not be taken away from him.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have examined the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota; and in view of the fact that his amendment makes provision for the taking of private dwellings, and mine does not, I will withdraw the amendment which I offered, in favor of the substitute offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado is withdrawn. The question recurs upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "constructed," in line 15, page 2, it is proposed to strike out the entire proviso down to and including line 24, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That colleges, museums, libraries, State or municipal buildings, and the furnishings of private dwellings shall not be acquired except by contract, nor shall any occupied dwelling be taken under the powers in this act given except by contract, unless the necessity thereof shall be determined by a judge of the circuit or district court of the United States exercising jurisdiction in the locality, on petition setting forth the reason and necessity for such taking. The hearing on such petition shall be upon notice to the owner and occupant of such dwelling, and the determination of such judge shall be final.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which I think the Senator from Virginia will accept. It is very plain, and I do not think there will be any objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, at the end of section 1, it is proposed to add the following:

Provided further, That in communities where housing development is to be carried on under this act such communities, or persons desiring so to do, shall be permitted to furnish a certain per cent of the cost of providing said housing facilities under such a plan of development and under such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of Labor and the persons interested in the plan of development, but in no instance shall a loan of more than 85 per cent of the cost of development be made to such communities or the persons interested in the development: And provided further, That the Government shall take a first lien for the amount of money so advanced by the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the passage of this bill if its passage is necessary; but I do not understand that amendment, and I should like to have it stated again.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will state that this is similar to the provision that has been made in the case of the Shipping Board. If a community wants to put up 15 per cent, or if the Government wants to make arrangements with the community by which better facilities can be provided for it, why should it not be allowed to put it up?

Mr. FALL. There is nothing to prevent its putting it up, is there?

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, I do not know.

Mr. SWANSON. This amendment provides that it shall put up the buildings and have a first lien upon them.

Mr. FALL. In other words, you are going to give the community a first lien instead of giving the Government a first lien.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, we would lose all the money we put into it.

Mr. OVERMAN. This does not provide for any first lien at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I do not know. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator will see that that gives no lien at all. The community does not take any security for the money or any note for it. It just puts up 15 per cent of the money, whether it ever gets it back or not. That is what the amendment means.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment would result in this, that if some particular individual of a community wanted to have the Government buildings erected at some special location, it would require the Government of the United States to put up 85 per cent of the money required to do it and——

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, not at all, Mr. President. In case they can agree on the place, and the community wants to put up 15 per cent, why, it can do it. There is no lien required, no note, or anything of the kind.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator says there is no lien required, no obligation, on the part of the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not a bit.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, it is all left with the Secretary of Labor, and he can make any sort of arrangement he desires. He can give a lien, he can put up the money with no security, the Government can lose it all, and the improvement can be made anywhere in the community that he may decide upon.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Secretary of Labor would do a thing like that, he ought to be impeached.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what the Secretary of Labor will do.

Mr. OVERMAN. It does not provide for any lien at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I know the amendment itself does not provide for a lien in words, but——

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all. It just allows the community to put up 15 per cent, if it desires to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sincerely trust that no such amendment as that will be put on this bill.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina what condition is going to be met by this amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. Sometimes they are going to build these houses near certain communities.

Mr. FALL. Where—what communities?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether it will ever be put into practice or not; but suppose they go to Boston, for example, and they want to build some of these houses, and the community says, "If you will lay out the streets and connect them with certain other streets, we will put up 15 per cent of the money," or something like that, some arrangement by which these houses might be made permanent, so that the residents might buy them after the war, and they would be put up with some idea of having the streets connected with the city streets. If they want to do that, under this amendment they can do so. There is no provision for any note or any lien, but the community makes a present to the Government of 15 per cent. That is all it is; but it is all left to the Secretary of Labor, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him. The amendment does not provide for taking any mortgage or any lien.

Mr. SMOOT. It does not say that he can not do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course, he can not do so unless he is authorized to do so. Let me ask the Senator from Utah this question: What right has the Secretary of Labor, unless he is authorized to do it, to take a mortgage or a lien?

Mr. FALL. He is authorized to do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. FALL. Why, certainly. It provides on page 3 that he can do that.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator would put in his amendment a provision that the Government shall take a first lien for the 85 per cent loan, it would be in conformity with the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am perfectly willing to put that in.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator amends his amendment in that way, it will be in conformity with the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. How would the Senator have it read?

Mr. SWANSON. "Provided, That the Government shall take a first lien for the amount of money so advanced."

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all right.

Mr. SMOOT. Not "the amount of money so advanced"; "the amount of money advanced by the Government."

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Secretary to put that in.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; "the amount of money so advanced by the Government." If that is put in, it will be in conformity with the rest of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection at all to that.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of this bill if he hopes to pass it before 2 o'clock?

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to dispose of this amendment first. I do not think the Senator has any objection to the amendment.

Mr. FALL. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh! I did not know that.

Mr. FALL. And I want to be heard generally on that subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. FALL. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] wishes, I think, to discuss this proposition, and he is absent. I have sent for him and he will be here in a few minutes. It ought not to be pressed to a vote at the present moment.

Mr. FALL. It undoubtedly can not reach a vote at present.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to ascertain from the Senator from North Carolina, who offered the amendment, just what particular condition it was proposed to cover. I am exceedingly anxious to know the theory of the amendment, because I unhesitatingly say that in my judgment there never has been so insidious an attempt to fasten, not State socialism but absolute socialism, upon this country as is made in this bill. To discuss this matter intelligently from my standpoint you must take, of course, the entire bill as it stands.

I am not going to discuss this matter as fully now as I shall later; but what would happen, for instance, if the amendment of the Senator is adopted, even with the amendment proposed—that is, that a first lien might be created to protect the Government in regard to any money which it advanced? What would happen? It places in the hands of the Secretary this power: He can go to Illinois, or to Indiana, or to North Carolina, or anywhere else in this broad country of ours, and, without the Government having taken over and proceeded to operate any plant or industry, the amendment allows the Secretary of Labor to go to any coal mine in the United States—the production of coal is a necessity, of course—not to have the President take over the operation of such mines under the power given him, or not to have the Fuel Administration take it over, but to have the Secretary of Labor take over the housing of every employee working in such mines, not to surrender it at the expiration of this war, but to continue to rent those houses and continue to handle them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I had no such intention as that. I agree with the Senator as to that. I do not want the Government to continue to rent these houses after the war.

Mr. FALL. Then the Senator will have to agree with me as to my general objections to this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I might do that, but I am talking about this amendment. If a community wants to put up 15 per cent in money for this purpose, I can not see why it should not be allowed to do so.

Mr. FALL. It leaves it perpetually, under the bill, in the hands of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; it does not. My amendment does not do that. The community loses it. My idea was that if they want to come to my town and build houses, if they determine to build them there, if my town wants to put up 15 per cent provided they will put sewerage there, they should be allowed to do it.

Mr. FALL. Who is going to do it? Who holds the title?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Government holds the title. Under any condition it holds the title; does it not?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I understand. I know the Senator's objection to the bill, and I am not arguing that matter with him now; but I say if this bill passes, notwithstanding the Senator's objection, would the Senator object to my amendment? That is the point.

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator would not object to my amendment if the bill passed; would he?

Mr. FALL. I would not object to the Senator's amendment, possibly, if I did not object to the bill itself.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I understand.

Mr. FALL. That is, if the Senator can get through a comprehensive amendment along the lines that he is discussing, by which individuals will agree to take a portion of the burden away from the Government, I will cheerfully vote for it, providing there is not a provision for everlasting and eternal socialism—not state socialism, but socialism—being fastened upon this Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course, I am against that as much as the Senator is; but when this bill is up here I think if a community wants to put up some of the money it should be allowed to do so. It is going to pass. Let us put in this amendment.

Mr. FALL. There is no objection to that. You can go on and produce your houses and turn them over to the Government. We will accept them.

As I say, I do not care to go into a full discussion of this measure now. I am going to discuss it at some little length—not as fully as I should like to do, because of the anxiety of the Senator who has it in charge to get it through—but I am opposed to this amendment because, as I say, it is not surrounded by the proper protection in the first place, and it simply leaves the whole matter in the hands of the Secretary of Labor to administer in perpetuity. As to this particular amendment, I am objecting to it because, while I do not desire for one moment to reflect upon the absolute integrity and sincerity of the Senator, in my judgment, and I say it very frankly, I think this is a real estate deal to have the United States Government build and lay out roads and a new town for somebody. I acquit the Senator of any knowledge of any such plan or purpose, of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator does, Mr. President; but the Senator knows that this is being done all the time by the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and this is only, as I thought, giving an opportunity to the Government to get part of its money back.

Mr. FALL. There is no difficulty about that. The Government will take anything that anybody will give it, just like some communities will take anything that they can get from the Government.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina is well intentioned, and in line with the operations that are now being carried on by the Shipping Board. Some weeks ago Congress appropriated $50,000,000 to be utilized by the Shipping Board for the purpose of creating housing facilities near the shipbuilding plants of the Nation. It was my privilege last Saturday to visit Newport News, and while there to talk with the president of the Newport

News Shipbuilding Co., Mr. Homer Ferguson, as to the method he was pursuing in solving the housing problems for the men employed in his plant. I was advised by him that a subsidiary company of the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. had purchased a tract of land of several hundred acres. They propose giving this land to the Government. It is their intention to make streets, they to ultimately put in water supply and sewer accommodations, and the Government is asked to furnish sufficient money to build houses upon this tract. Under the terms of the contract, as Mr. Ferguson explained to me, the Government had agreed to advance $3,000,000. This, with the improvements made on the land, was to be divided up so that the Government would have a first lien on each individual house and the lot accompanying it for all of the money it had advanced on that particular piece of property. The local company is to take a second lien for the cost of the land. It is expected that these houses will be sold to workmen in the shipyard and mortgages given for the full value of the property, payable in monthly installments. The contract further provides, as I understand, that at the end of three years some Federal agency will appraise the property, and if the war is over and value of the property has decreased, the Government will strike off not exceeding 20 per cent of its investment, and it is believed that the Government will get back substantially 80 per cent of its outlay.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. From what the Senator says, I take it for granted that the object of the bill is to allow some person who owns an addition somewhere near some city where the Government expects to build these homes to sell that land, based upon the fact that the Government is going to put up so many buildings there and make that a center, thus enhancing the value of the land in that addition. It looks to me as though that is the object of it.

Mr. CALDER. I do not want to accuse the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. of having any such idea in mind; but I do say that the ultimate result of what the Government is doing will be to enhance the value of the land in the neighborhood of this property.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator has just given us some very interesting information. From what I have heard of the gentleman with whom he was in conference, I have a high opinion of him and of his ability along certain lines. They have entered into a contract now, the Government and the Newport News Shipbuilding Co.

Mr. CALDER. No; a company composed of some members interested in the Newport News Shipbuilding Co.

Mr. FALL. A real estate company. It is a contract between the real estate company and the Government?

Mr. CALDER. The Shipping Board.

Mr. FALL. What authority had anyone to make such a contract on behalf of the Government?

Mr. CALDER. I presume that under the terms of the act passed by Congress some weeks ago the Shipping Board felt that it had the authority.

Mr. FALL. This would confirm such a contract if it had been made. There has been no authority for it heretofore, and this would ratify it, if the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is adopted.

Mr. CALDER. In conversation with gentlemen at Newport News they assume that under the terms of the act passed the Shipping Board had authority to make the contract.

Mr. FALL. To go in partners with certain individuals?

Mr. CALDER. In a measure; yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3771.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill which has just been laid aside, and I ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. CALDER. I had the floor. Do I lose the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is now before the Senate, and the Senator from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. WOLCOTT. For the information of the junior Senator from New York I will state that I had the floor yesterday when the unfinished business was before the Senate, and I take it that under the rule I will resume the floor to-day when the unfinished business again comes before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Delaware is correct. I chanced to be occupying the chair at the time of the adjournment. The Senator from Delaware was recognized and announced that he would continue the discussion of the measure to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the Senator from Delaware is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NEW. I ask the Senator from Delaware to yield that I may present an amendment to the bill which has just been laid aside, in order that it may be printed and laid upon the desks of Senators to-morrow, when I shall speak to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator from Delaware yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to offer two amendments to the previous bill and ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should like to offer an amendment to the bill and have it printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I desire as briefly as possible to submit some views upon the bill familiarly known as the Overman bill, the bill being the one which authorizes the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, and so forth. The purpose of the bill is set forth in the first six or seven lines, and that purpose I will indicate by reading the language of the bill in those few lines:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces the President is hereby authorized—

And so forth.

Those few lines very briefly state the objects and purposes of the bill.

Of course, if the bill in its provisions contributes materially to the accomplishment of those purposes no Senator would have any objection to the bill. There are some Senators who, however, take a different point of view, namely, that the powers granted by the bill do not in any way materially contribute to those very laudable purposes.

The first section of the bill authorizes the President, in such manner as he may deem best fitted to carry out the purposes that I have described, to redistribute the functions, the duties, and powers by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer.

The second section of the bill provides that in the carrying out of these purposes which I have mentioned the President may utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any executive or administrative commission, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers now existing by law; that he may transfer any functions or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau or agency, office or officer to another, and that he may transfer the personnel or part thereof from one commission, and so forth, to another, either in whole or in part, by way of assignment.

The other sections of the bill are not so important as the two sections I have just mentioned. I shall, therefore, not undertake to analyze those other sections.

This bill has been assailed as unconstitutional in that it undertakes to delegate to the Executive powers which, under the Constitution, properly belong to the legislative branch of the Government. I see no merit in this contention. I shall not, however, elaborate my views in this respect, being content to adopt for myself the views on this point so ably presented on yesterday by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

Mr. President, I wish first to emphasize the point that this bill does not undertake to confer any substantive power upon the President. It does not give the President, and by the President I mean impersonally to refer to the Chief Executive and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, any power of a substantive nature that he does not already possess. It simply authorizes him to transfer the powers he now possesses from one official to another, the result of which is that the President is given no additional power, but is simply authorized to execute the powers he already has through officers or officials or bureaus or commissions other than those now designated by law as the proper ones to exercise the powers thus already conferred upon him.

Senators conceive that the bill grants to the President an alarmingly large quantity of power. It is so alarmingly large to them that their fears are exercised and they can not bring themselves to the point of view that it is wise to grant the President such powers. While the bill in the two sections I have just mentioned unquestionably does grant large powers, not of a substantive nature, however, yet it is hedged about with limitations contained in the bill itself.

I have heard Senators in discussing this bill argue that under its terms the President can destroy the whole executive machinery which Congress for 125 years or more has been busy constructing and setting up. They take the position that the executive department is a perfect machine, the result of the wisdom of 125 years of American statesmen laboring here in Congress, and that this bill undertakes to give the President power with the destroying hand to disrupt the whole machinery of government so constructed by these many years of legislative effort.

Mr. President, the bill has its limitations. I take it that there is first a common-sense limitation imposed upon the President when he comes to undertake to exercise the powers conferred by the bill. The President is engaged in the leadership of a great task. The main business of the country to-day is the fighting of this gigantic war. The President would be guilty of that lack of common sense which the ordinary man has if in the presence of this great undertaking, enough to consume the attention of the greatest man in the country, he were to undertake to waste time to reorganize the civil departments of the Government in respects that have nothing to do with the prosecution of the war. The President is not going, of course, as a matter of common sense, to undertake to deal with processes of civil administration when he has the immense and all-consuming task of undertaking to handle our affairs in the conduct of this great war.

I say outside of the terms of the bill, therefore, there is a common-sense limitation to be placed upon these powers by which we are entitled, as sensible men, to conclude that the President is not going to undertake to reform, to reorganize, and reconstruct all the departments of the Government.

Therefore, when I hear Senators get on their feet and express such alarm at what the President is going to do in all departments of the Government, I confess, Mr. President, that I listen somewhat with impatience, because I can not bring myself to believe that as a matter of common sense the President is going to undertake to do any of the absurd and ridiculous things that Senators charge him with a purpose or an intent of trying to do in case the bill becomes a law. The bill, in section 1, contains a limitation in terms, the language being as follows:

Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

Mr. President, that is a real limitation. I very much disagree with the distinguished and able senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] when he states, as he did the other day, that the limitation contained in that proviso amounts to nothing. I quite thoroughly disagree with that proposition. With that proviso in the bill, in case it remains in the bill when it becomes a law, Congress must be understood to have meant something when the proviso was enacted. If the proviso remains a part of the bill, of course, the President is still left to judge in his discretion whether or not a particular and proposed change that he contemplates does relate to the conduct of the war. I recognize that. I recognize that if the President is bent upon violating the spirit of this proviso he can, if in his folly he chose to do so, go to the extreme length that Senators fear he might go. But, Mr. President, until the Chief Executive of the country has given the Congress some reason to believe that he will pervert the language of Congress, that he will deliberately violate the spirit and intent of Congress, that he will for some Machiavellian purpose try to do that which he knows, by the language employed in the bill Congress does not mean him to do, until he demonstrates he is a man of that character, I for one decline to accept the point of view that the proviso amounts to nothing. I say it does amount to something.

The President can not but be guided by that proviso, and bona fide have it in mind when he undertakes to change or in anywise redistribute the functions of the executive departments. Unless he honestly and sincerely believes that the proposed change relates to the conduct of the war, I insist that he will not advocate or order the change unless, with all the facts before him, knowing the full situation as he knows it better than any man in Congress, he, in his honest opinion, believes the proposed redistribution is necessary; and in such case I am quite willing that he should make such change without having to come to Congress for specific authority.

There is another limitation in this bill which makes it so that any change the President might effect shall last only for a limited period, that period being during the war and one year, I believe, thereafter. I can see no particular reason why it should extend to a whole year after the end of the war. That is immaterial, however, now; but at all events there can be no permanent reconstruction of the executive departments of the Government under the bill, because whatever change takes place the departments will be restored to their present condition a year after the ending of the war.

So, Mr. President, let us assume the extravagant thing, that if this bill becomes a law the President of the United States will do the extreme and absurd things that Senators apprehend he might do, which I do not think he will do, yet the fact is that, assuming that he is going to use these powers in a destructive way the very worst thing that can happen is that it will last only during this war. I think I have made myself clear, however, to the effect that I do not apprehend any such disastrous consequences growing from this bill as do Senators who have addressed themselves to it on previous occasions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as the Senator from Delaware referred to me, I want to correct him about one possible inference in what he has said. I hope nothing that has fallen from me would lead to the conclusion that I think the President would recklessly or foolishly exercise the powers of this bill. I have never asserted that he would be likely to do anything of that kind.

But taking the Interstate Commerce Commission as an example again, that has been used so often, the Senator from Delaware knows that when we were considering the railway bill recently passed it was urged before the committee and afterwards upon the floor of the Senate that it was necessary that the President should have exclusive final power over railway rates in order to enable him to successfully prosecute the war. In my solicitude, therefore, for the preservation of some of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission I am not conjecturing with regard to what he would consider a subject relating to the conduct of the war; I think the Senator from Delaware will agree with me that, looked at from the standpoint of the administration, it does relate to the conduct of the war.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I do not recall that I asserted that the Senator from Iowa had expressed his belief that the President would deliberately embark upon a career of reckless administering of this law. What I said was that the Senator from Iowa, as I recall, asserted it as his opinion that this proviso confining the power of the President to matters relating to the conduct of the war amounted to nothing.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the Senator. If I am incorrect I wish to be corrected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said substantially what the Senator from Delaware has just imputed to me, and I said it because I believe, and I think most people believe, that everything which concerns the Government of the United States and the welfare of this people at this time is in some manner related to the conduct of the war.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Unquestionably that is true, Mr. President. All governmental activities relate in some degree, though it may be in a very remote degree, to the conduct of the war. In the application of the language of the proviso I take it that the President would be guided somewhat by the line of reasoning that applies in the application of damage suit law, where the doctrine of proximate and remote cause is applicable. I do say and believe that before the President undertakes to exercise any power under this act he will be convinced in his mind that there is a real, genuine, material connection between the proposed act and the conduct of the war.

Touching the Interstate Commerce Commission, to which the Senator referred a moment ago, I shall not be diverted to discuss that at this moment, because unless I depart from the line of discussion which I have in mind I shall have something to say about the Interstate Commerce Commission later on.

Mr. President, the scope of this bill, notwithstanding its limitation, I conceive is broad. But that fact does not alarm me. That is the thing which commends the bill to me. I want broad powers given to the President in the exercise of his duty as Chief Executive and Commander in Chief at this particular time. If I have any complaint against the bill at all, it is that it is not broad enough. Our undertaking right now is a big one. It is not only the biggest war the country has ever been engaged in, but it is the biggest business proposition any administration has ever had thrust upon it, and in the presence of such a large task we have got to confer broad and ample powers on the President, and in so far as the bill undertakes to do that I commend it. The broader it is, within the limits of the Constitution, the more I favor it. The more restricted it is, the less am I drawn to it. Our Army has jumped to 1,700,000 men, our Navy to a total of men and officers of three hundred and twenty-one odd thousand. We have had to train and equip, feed and clothe, provide with guns and munitions, provide with everything that goes to sustain an Army and a Navy of this immense magnitude, expanded suddenly to its present size, and we are contemplating increasing the establishment still more. That is a big task, Mr. President. We have had to provide camps, we have had to train thousands of officers, we have had placed upon this administration a task the like of which I dare to assert no other administration in the history of the country has dealt with or in future will ever have to deal with.

As illustrating the violent changes in our whole life, particularly industrial life, that this war has occasioned I want to read from the testimony of Mr. Catchings, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, who appeared before the Military Affairs Committee in one of their recent investigations. That testimony appears on page 1891 of the third part of the hearings before that committee. Mr. Catchings said:

> We have, Mr. Senator, approached this situation largely from that standpoint—
> The industrial standpoint.
> In our judgment the situation in industry is most unfortunate. We are having withdrawn from industry an amount of labor and material which is measured by the gigantic sum of $19,000,000,000. I doubt if the gross output of all of our business of every sort and description has ever exceeded $45,000,000,000 to $50,000,000,000. Certainly it has never exceeded $80,000,000,000. I think that can be taken unquestionably as an outside figure. We know that the total value of all the wealth of the United States is not more than $225,000,000,000. Now, we are going to withdraw from our industry in one year, according to the program, one-tenth, approximately, of all our total wealth. We are going to withdraw one-half of our annual output.

Those figures are significant, Mr. President, because of the things they connote, a revolution complete in our whole life, and the President, because he is the Executive and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, is at the head of this whole complete enterprise, this thing which in its ramifications is so remote that it is impossible to conceive where it touches. In the presence of such a task as this I say the Chief Executive ought to be vested with broad and ample powers to meet whatever situation might arise from day to day.

If we had to-day an organization that was, in the judgment of those who constructed it, capable of taking care of such a big task, still there would be danger, because of the enormity of it, that the organization might break down in its functioning. But at the outbreak of the war our organization had by no means been built wholly or even approximately up to the point where it could hope with entire satisfaction to approach this big task. It has been compelled to be developed suddenly—overnight, so to speak—and to expect it to do so perfectly is as foolish as to expect a corner grocery store at some country crossroads where general merchandise has been handled to smoothly and satisfactorily expand in a week's time to the size of a John Wanamaker or a Sears & Roebuck affair. If there was such an expansion as that, of course, there would be occasional failure; of course there would be unfortunate fallings down here and there.

Mr. President, this governmental machine of ours has been compelled to be developed to an extent overnight, which I think justly entitles the comparison to be made of the development of the little store I have just mentioned to a vast retail mail-order house or to some huge Sears & Roebuck concern.

It is inevitable that changes must be made in this Government from day to day. No man can foresee a week hence what changes wisdom would suggest. There must be from day to day, as the days go on, change and more change. As experience suggests to the Executive that at this particular spot the organization is not functioning properly, he will of course desire to have a change made, and somebody will have to make it. The question is, Shall we leave it to the discretion of the Executive or compel him to come here to Congress for little bills to authorize him to do this and to do that?

The changes that are needed I classify as being of two sorts. A great deal of the complication in the machinery, I have no doubt, results from mere departmental rules. The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the other day in his address, pointed out an experience he had when he was Secretary of the Interior, indicating the intricacies of the business in the Interior Department occasioned solely by departmental practices. This statute, of course, is not needed to correct any such defects as those that arise from departmental rules or practices; the head of the department can get rid of them in a moment's time by issuing the proper order.

But there is another class of changes which from time to time will be necessary, and those changes are necessary in matters that are fixed not by departmental rules or practices but by statutes passed by Congress that make rigid the machinery, statutes that allow the machinery no flexibility, statutes that define the rut in which the Government must travel in this time of great emergency. To meet such defects as those existing by reason of statutes or arising out of statutes or statutory enactments this bill is absolutely necessary.

It has been very frequently said here on the floor that there are no changes the President might desire that he could not already effect without the enactment of this bill. I challenge that statement, Mr. President. I do not propose to point out in detail what statutory restrictions and shackles there are which have been placed upon the arm of the Executive and which this bill is designed to remove. I do not propose, I say, to point out the changes that are necessary; but I do propose to point out to the Senate the fact that if the Executive is not bound by statute in his actions as Chief Executive, then the Congress in numerous instances in the past has been engaged in the folly of passing legislation here, the very purpose of which is to free the Executive from statutory restrictions. These statutes, which have been frequently passed in Congress from time to time, are predicated upon the theory that while the Constitution lays upon the Executive the duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed, yet when Congress gives him an officer with functions through whom he is to execute the laws, the President must keep within the four corners of the act creating that particular officer, and must execute the law strictly in the manner defined by the statute.

On February 14, 1903, Congress passed an act creating the General Staff. If the President has power to do as he pleases in handling the Army and Navy and its organization, then it was never necessary for Congress to pass that act. The act provides for the creation of the General Staff, and specifically authorizes the President to assign officers by detail to that General Staff. Furthermore, this General Staff act provides that—> upon being relieved from duty in the General Staff Corps officers shall return to the branch of the Army in which they hold permanent commission, and no officer shall be eligible to a further detail in the General Staff Corps until he shall have served two years with the branch of the Army in which commissioned, except in case of emergency or in time of war.

Mr. President, if the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief, is not restricted by statute in the exercise of his powers, then it was never necessary to specifically authorize him by statute to detail officers to the General Staff. This General Staff act further employs this language in defining the duties of the General Staff Corps: It says that amongst those duties this is one, to "perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may be" from time to time prescribed by the President. Again recognizing the fact that in the Army the President is not free to do as he chooses, he is restricted in his operations by statutes.

In 1916 an act of Congress was passed authorizing the Treasury Department, the Department of Commerce, the Federal Trade Commission, or any other departments or independent establishments of the Government to detail from time to time such officials and employees to the United States Tariff Commission as the President may direct.

If it be true that the President has power in the administration of his office to act in the way of transferring officers from here to there, or assigning them from this duty to that, as is contended by some Senators, why was it necessary for Congress to pass this act specifically authorizing him to transfer or detail officers from these various departments to the Tariff Commission? Other acts of the same character which Congress has passed are as follows:

In 1880 Congress authorized the President to detail temporarily three competent naval officers for the service of the War Department in the inspection of transport vessels.

In 1880 the Secretary of War was authorized to detail two officers of the Ordnance Corps to serve with the Geological Survey.

In 1890 the President was authorized to detail the Chief Signal Officer to have charge of the Weather Bureau and to assign four other Army officers to that bureau.

In 1917 the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy were authorized to detail Army and Navy surgeons to the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance.

In 1902 the President was authorized to utilize the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service in times of threatened or actual war to such an extent and in such manner as shall promote the public interest, without, however, in anywise impairing the efficiency of the service for the purposes for which the same was created and is maintained.

In 1915 it was directed by act of Congress that the Coast Guard shall operate as a part of the Navy, subject to the orders of the Secretary of the Navy, in time of war or when the President shall so direct.

In 1916 the President was authorized, in his discretion, in the time of national emergency to transfer to the service and jurisdiction of the Navy Department or of the War Department such vessels, equipment, stations, and personnel of the Lighthouse Service as he may deem to the best interests of the country, and after such transfer all expenses connected therewith shall be defrayed out of the appropriation for the department to which the transfer is made.

In 1917, again, the President was authorized, in his like discretion, to transfer to the service and jurisdiction of the War Department or of the Navy Department such vessels, equipment, stations, and personnel of the Coast and Geodetic Survey as he may deem to the best interests of the country.

The act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor authorized the transfer of numerous officers with their functions to, and the consolidating of them in, the new department.

Mr. President, all of these acts which I have enumerated are predicated upon the theory that the President could not do any of the things therein specifically authorized, unless he had statutory authority from the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. As one who is opposed to certain parts of this bill, I would not have it thought that I am of the opinion that the President can disregard these statutes relating to the organization of our military forces.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I may interrupt the Senator, does the Senator's statement also apply to the civil department of the Government as to which the President must act?

Mr. CUMMINS. I could not answer that question generally, but I have no reason to doubt the constitutionality of the statutes relating to other parts of the Government. The Senator from Delaware will remember that, under the Constitution, Congress is expressly given authority "to raise and support armies" and "regulation of the land and naval forces." So these laws which have been passed relating to that subject could not, of course, be disregarded by the President; and if we want to relieve him of the obligation to carry them out we must pass a statute for that purpose.

My opposition to this bill is not founded upon the theory that the President can set aside all the legislation of Congress with respect to departments of the Government. I am perfectly willing to give him absolute and plenary authority to deal with all these departments of the Government. My opposition to the bill is based entirely upon the fact that the bill embraces functions and departments of the Government with which the President has had nothing whatsoever to do in the past and concerning which he ought to have nothing whatsoever to do. The Senator from Delaware can not go faster or farther than I am willing to go in giving the President authority to coordinate, consolidate, and transfer the powers and functions in those departments of the Government which are ordinarily known as the executive departments.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I had not meant to be understood that the Senator from Iowa was one of those who believed that the President could do everything which the advocates of this bill desire to give him authority to do without the passage of the bill. I have not placed the Senator in that category; but there are Senators here who have argued on the floor that the Overman bill is not necessary because the President can do all that the advocates of the bill say he should be permitted to do, even without the passage of the bill. It is to that group of Senators, or to the argument of that group of Senators, that I have just been addressing my remarks.

Mr. President, from time to time very frequently Congress has been engaged in passing little bills specifically authorizing the President to do various things, and those things, to a very large extent, connected with the prosecution of the war.

The junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], whose name graces this bill, called the bills to which I have just referred "popgun bills," bills that are going through Congress here and with which Congress ought not to be bothered, and that the President ought not to be compelled to come to Congress at this time when we are at war and ask for. I should prefer to call them "peanut bills," little bills coming here that require legislation in Congress to be passed to authorize the President to do some little thing that is absolutely necessary but not in itself, perhaps, of very great consequence. The whole legislative machinery is busy with jacks and crowbars rolling a little legislative peanut from one House of Congress to the other, and Congress ought not to be bothered with such things, nor ought the President have to await the laborious processes of Congress to get such things to the point where he could act upon them.

I hold in my hand a bill which went through the Senate last March, which in itself I think is not one of the little peanut bills; I think it is a bill of some considerable importance. That bill is known as Senate bill 3982. Its title is "To suspend certain restrictions on the purchase and distribution of military stores and supplies, and for other purposes." It provides as follows:

That so much of section 1133, United States Revised Statutes, and of section 9 of an act of Congress entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as restricts the purchase and distribution of military stores and supplies and the work of construction and repair to officers of the Quartermaster Corps, be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of the present war.

Section 1133 of the Revised Statutes, as I recall, lays the duty on the Quartermaster's Corps to purchase the Army supplies and places upon it the charge of the work of construction and repair. Such power is limited by the section to the Quartermaster Corps. This bill was passed by the Senate suspending that statute. Let me show the Senate as to that bill, which seems of great importance, how slowly has been its progress through Congress. It was introduced on February 28 of this year; on March 4 it was reported to the Senate without amendment; on March 23 it was read the third time and passed. It was nearly a month in getting through the Senate. On March 29 it was referred to the House Committee on Military Affairs, where it is now pending.

The bill, as I have said, was introduced on February 28; two months nearly have elapsed, and the bill is not yet out of the Military Affairs Committee of the other House.

Mr. President, we need some legislation that would authorize the President, in case he deems such a thing necessary as is contained in Senate bill 3982, to do it offhand. We should not compel him to come to Congress and ask authority specifically that he might do things which strictly and solely relate to the conduct of the war, and which need to be done quickly.

There is no question that the Government is hampered by red tape. It seems to be a fatal disposition of human nature to get involved in red tape. Things must be done according to rule; they must follow the beaten path of precedent; there must be checks and balances; this man must see to this thing and that man must see to that thing. That is true in all the walks of life. The thing which we call "red tape" is everywhere inclined to unwind itself and entangle the feet of those who want to move forward and accomplish results. The red tape of which I speak is due, as I have suggested, to departmental rules in part and to statutes in part. I wish to illustrate to the Senate the operation of red tape not in governmental matters but in matters which in the days of the courtly French were connected with what was known as court etiquette. What I am about to read has nothing to do with government, but it does illustrate rather forcefully, to my mind, the disposition of those who have something to do to become involved in form and red tape. I read from E. J. Lowell's book entitled "The Eve of the French Revolution," published by Houghton, Mifflin Co. in 1892. The extract is from page 19, and is as follows:

Madame Campan, long a waiting woman of Marie Antoinette, has left an account of the toilet of the Queen and of the little occurrences that might interrupt it. The whole performance, she says, was a masterpiece of etiquette; everything about it was governed by rules. The lady of honor and the lady of the bedchamber, both, if they were there together, assisted by the first woman and the two other women, did the principal service; but there were distinctions among them.

Mr. President, this sounds very much like a governmental operation. Of course, it is applied to the Queen's bedchamber, and yet it is a very apt illustration. Resuming:

The lady of the bedchamber put on the skirt and presented the gown. The lady of honor poured out the water to wash the Queen's hands and put on the chemise. When a princess of the royal family or a princess of the blood was present at the toilet, the lady of honor gave up the latter function to her. To a princess of the royal family—that is to say, to the sister, sister-in-law, or aunt of the King, she handed the garment directly, but to a princess of the blood—the King's cousin by blood or marriage—she did not yield this service. In the latter case the lady of honor handed the chemise to the first woman, who presented it to the princess of the blood. Every one of these ladies observed these customs scrupulously, as appertaining to her rank.

One winter's day it happened that the Queen, entirely undressed, was about to put on her chemise. Madame Campan was holding it unfolded. The lady of honor came in, made haste to take off her gloves, and took the chemise. While she still had it in her hands there came a knock at the door, which was immediately opened. The newcomer was the Duchess of Orleans, a princess of the blood. Her highness's gloves were taken off, she advanced to take the shift, but the lady of honor must not give it directly to her, and therefore passed it back to Madame Campan, who gave it to the princess. Just then there came another knock at the door—

Now, see who comes in and upsets it all—and the Countess of Provence, known as Madame, and sister-in-law to the King was ushered in. The Duchess of Orleans presented the chemise to her. Meanwhile the Queen kept her arms crossed on her breast and looked cold. Madame saw her disagreeable position and, without waiting to take off her gloves—

She cut the red tape, so to speak—merely threw away her handkerchief and put the chemise on the Queen.

Mr. President, I submit that in many instances the country is standing with its arms across its breast, remaining cold while functionaries are indulging in all the form and nonsense of red tape, imposed upon them in part, to be sure, by departmental rules, but in large measure and in many ways imposed upon them by Congress itself. It is now high time that the executive branch of this Government should be unshackled and Congress should confer full and ample power upon the President to do that which ought to be done, without all this nonsense, delay, and folly.

I think that this bill, in the powers conferred, is not quite so broad as some Senators contend. I have already expressed my opinion that the bill does not even embrace the pet of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], to wit, the Interstate Commerce Commission. I know that in that respect I very radically differ from his view.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Delaware, on reflection, will withdraw a part of his suggestion. I have no pet; the Interstate Commerce Commission is no more my pet than the President of the United States is my pet. I am simply trying to do what I regard as best for this country.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I recognize that desire of the Senator, and I am far from being one of those who has any word of criticism against the Senator's course. I used the term rather facetiously. The Senator is, I take it, and all the country knows it, very much interested in the Interstate Commerce Commission and the problems connected with the operations of that commission. That was all I meant by referring to it as the Senator's pet.

I do not agree at all that the President can do anything with the Interstate Commerce Commission under this bill that will destroy the commission. In the first place, I have very serious doubt whether the commission is within the terms of the bill.

I think that as to the matter that is vital in the commission's operations, to wit, the rate-making power, it exercises a judicial function, while this bill authorizes the President to transfer only functions that are exercised by executive and administrative commissions and bureaus. In so far as the Interstate Commerce Commission has any power to fix rates, practices, and regulations that are to govern the railroads of the country in their operations, I think it is not at all within the scope of the bill; and, in the second place, if it were, I do not believe the President could, after the exercise of serious reflection, say that the making of rates was so related to the conduct of the war that he deemed it necessary to transfer that power, for instance, to the Director General of Railroads. Such action as that I would consider an abuse of power on the part of the President. It would be in substance transferring the cause of the litigant—and the Director General of Railroads technically would be the litigant before the Interstate Commerce Commission—from the judge, to wit, the commission, to the litigant himself; and I can not conceive for a moment that such a thing would ever be done by the President in case this bill becomes law.

Furthermore, I question whether the rate-making power left in the Interstate Commerce Commission amounts to much anyhow. That matter has been discussed to some extent upon this floor, and I shall not review the argument upon it or express my views. The situation, as I see it, is that during this war, and while the railroads are under the control of the Government in essence and substance, the Director General is going to fix the rates.

When we come to the matter of valuing the railroads, a function that the Interstate Commerce Commission is performing, and which some Senators think the President will take out of the hands of the commission and transfer to some one else, I am fully persuaded that the President could not do that under this bill. Certainly the valuation of the railroads has no relation to the conduct of the war, and, if it were undertaken to be transferred, the job never could be completed before the end of this war; which, in turn, emphasizes my point of view that the valuation of the railroads can have no relation, even a remote relation, to the conduct of the war. I have all the confidence in the world that if the bill becomes a law the valuation of the railroads will proceed as heretofore, without interruption or change.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. In order that the Senator from Delaware may know, if he does not already know, the view held by those—and I am not one of them—who think that the valuation of the railroads now in progress before the Interstate Commerce Commission has something to do with the conduct of the war or has some relation to the conduct of the war, I suggest—and I suggest it because I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from Delaware upon it—that the Government has undertaken to finance the railroads during the war; it has undertaken, under some circumstances, to buy their bonds or find a market for their bonds; it has undertaken, in other instances, to advance money to the railroads. It is said that the valuation of a property directly affects the market for the securities issued upon the basis of that property, and it is contended—and I am not now speaking inadvisedly—that, inasmuch as the Government has in a sense guaranteed the market for the securities issued upon railroad property, therefore the valuation of the property, although originally inaugurated to furnish a basis for rates, is now directly connected with the prosecution of the war and ought to be taken out of the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission and given to some other person or officer.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not agree that such a relation as the Senator has just pointed out can in all fairness be said to connect the valuation of the railroads with the conduct of the present war. I do not wish to pause to discuss the question for any length of time, because, after all, I consider it more or less unimportant. I do not know how long this valuation has been going on, but I understand it has been proceeding for three or four years. However, it is yet three or four years in the future before it will ever be finished; and certainly there is great likelihood that the war will be over long before the valuation of the railroads will ever be completed. That circumstance points very forcefully to me the thought that the valuing of the railroads has absolutely nothing to do with the conduct of the war; and, furthermore, I am not sure that the valuation of securities is dependent upon the valuation of the railroads as it might be found by the commission. The value of securities in the judgment of most investors is based rather upon the earning power than upon actual assets. A very fine piece of land that is at the bottom of a river is not much good; the productive yield of a thing is, in the main, what makes its value. So that I do not think that even by a wild stretch of reasoning the matter of valuing the railroads is within the scope of this bill at all.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. As I understand, the Senator from Delaware does not believe that the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission relative to the railroads have anything to do with the conduct of the war, and therefore that the President could not, under this bill, transfer their authority to anyone else?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; the Senator misunderstands my position. My position is that in the vital matter of regulating rates and prescribing rules and regulations, and so on, the Interstate Commerce Commission exercises a judicial function and therefore is not within the terms of the bill, which applies only to executive and administrative functions, commissions, and so on.

Mr. KELLOGG. In that case, then——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the Senate is now operating under a unanimous-consent agreement which provides that no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 30 minutes on the bill, nor more than once nor longer than 20 minutes upon an amendment offered thereto. The present occupant of the Chair has heretofore ruled that under such a unanimous-consent agreement as this, when an amendment is pending it is only to the amendment that a Senator can address himself. Arguments will proceed for 20 minutes, therefore, there being a pending amendment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. If I should not conclude in 20 minutes will it be possible for me then to avail myself of the 30 minutes on the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not under the ruling that the Chair has heretofore made. We will get rid of the amendments first, and then we will talk upon the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then, as I understand the Senator, the duties performed by the commission relative to the fixing and regulation of rates, fares, and charges have no relation to the war——

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; I have not said that.

Mr. KELLOGG. And under this bill the President could not take those duties away and give them to somebody else?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; the Senator still misunderstands me. I have not said that the regulation of rates has no relation to the war. I say that in performing the function of regulating rates the Interstate Commerce Commission is not acting as an executive or administrative body. It is performing, in my opinion, a judicial function, and the bill therefore can not reach it, not because the thing that it is doing has no relation to the war but because it is a judicial function, the bill being confined only to executive and administrative functions.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then the position of the Senator from Delaware is, that being a judicial function, this bill does not reach that function, and the President could not take away that judicial function?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then there can be no objection to excepting those functions from the bill, can there?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Personally I do not care whether they are excepted or not. I think I stated that in the committee, and I have stated it on the floor. I shall vote, however, against excepting them, because for my part I do not know what proposition is going to come up next to except something else which I might consider unobjectionable, and then something else, and thus I might be led into a series of votes the last one of which I would not care to cast. Viewing the bill as I do, I see no reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission should be excepted from its provisions. I think it is not included in its provisions, and to except from the bill something that is not in it seems to me to be an absurdity.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator one further question, and then I will not interrupt him again. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has held over and over again that the duties of the commission were administrative or executive and were not judicial?

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; I am not aware of that, Mr. President; and I assert that the Supreme Court has never ruled upon that point. I am quite aware of the decisions referred to the other day by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I think I supplemented his references by a reference of my own to a Supreme Court decision reviewing the State of Mississippi Railroad Commission cases, in which the Supreme Court, in the course of its opinion, referring to such commissions, used the word "administrative"; but there is no ruling on that point, there is no decision on the point, there is no finding, so far as I am aware, by the Supreme Court that the Interstate Commerce Commission is an administrative commission and not a judicial commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. I only have 20 minutes, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is one question that I am sure the Senator would want me to ask him. There is a distinction between passing on a rate which has been charged, and of which complaint is made, and fixing a rate for the future. The former involves a judicial inquiry, and is a judicial function; but I am sure the Senator from Delaware knows that all courts, from time immemorial, have held that determining a rate that is to be applied in the future is not a judicial function, and you can not clothe courts with the power to determine a rate for the future.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am not aware of that, Mr. President. If that is the law, it is contrary to my notions of what the law ought to be, yet I have oftentimes found that my notions of what the law ought to be did not exactly coincide with those of the courts, which unfortunately disagreed with me.

However, referring to the observation of the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I wish to observe that if the passing upon a rate that already has been charged is a judicial function, that is in harmony with what I have been arguing as to the judicial quality of the commission's acts; and if passing upon future rates is not competent to be conferred on courts, then the commission can not be said to possess such a power at all, and the power is therefore not in anywise involved in this discussion.

I desire to call attention to the practice of the Roman people in the matter of creating a dictator.

The glories that were Rome's, which historians applaud and the world admires, came to the seven-hilled city during the centuries of her life as a Republic. In war her legions excelled the achievements of the Greek phalanx and followed victory through the whole of the civilized world until her eagles screamed upon the very fringes of wild barbarism. Rome has, by her ancient past, inclined men to believe that republics, notwithstanding their theoretical weakness, due to a division of authority, yet are powerful to wage vigorous war against peoples of whatever form of government, however concentrated and autocratic, and therefore theoretically swift may be their action.

Yet, Mr. President, the magnificence of Rome's martial glory was achieved, not entirely by her ordinary and peace-time agencies. In times of extreme national stress that great people of ancient days possessed the wisdom to see the folly of clinging too tenaciously to their conceptions of what is wise in governmental machinery in times of peace as a means sufficient to amply and safely serve them in times of serious war. They realized the danger to their arms if the dual consulate should continue to divide authority in matters of war and even of civil administration and control in time of war.

Accordingly their constitution provided for the appointment of a dictator, upon occasions of great emergency. In this official were vested full and complete powers not only over the army but as well over the life and property of the citizen in his mere civil relations. The whole imperium was in the dictator's keeping. Plutarch mentions the fact that after Hannibal, following his sensational march over the Alps, had defeated the Romans at Trebia, and marching through Tuscany had slain 15,000 of them at Lake Thrasymenus, the Romans in their consternation resorted to the dictatorship, selecting Fabius Maximus for that high and all-powerful office. As indicating the extent and power of his authority as dictator, the same writer further tells us that Fabius appeared in public with 24 lictors carrying before him the fasces, the emblems of the authority of the two consuls (each of whom were entitled to be preceded by 12). But the dictator so superseded all ordinary authority that upon meeting the consul who survived Thrasymenus, preceded as usual by his 12 lictors, Fabius ordered him to dismiss his lictors and the other ensigns of his employment and to join him as a private man, thereby emphasizing the complete concentration of all power in the one dominant figure whom the crisis had called forth as the leader.

For 500 years, Rome at various crises in her history invoked the lex de dictatore creando. From glory to glory she went and, though in war a dictator arose, yet the liberties of her people were in no wise endangered. From the plow came a dictator on two occasions and back to the plow he went upon the disappearance of the dangers that threatened his country.

Mr. President, I do not mention this historical illustration in order to advocate similar measures in this country. I am not asking that this great Republic of the twentieth century borrow from her sister Republic of antiquity, the office and functions of the Roman dictator. Let no Senator misunderstand me. Our system has no place for such an office. It is contrary to the genius of our institutions. I mention the practice of Rome in this particular, only that I may show how the ancient Romans, whose genius for law and science of government, has never, perhaps even to this day, been excelled or surpassed, regarded as necessary in time of war the concentration of power and the focalizing of authority in one responsible head.

This bill, of course, does not undertake to constitute of the President a dictator. It does, however, and herein is its merit, adopt to a very slight degree the underlying wisdom of the Romans by undertaking to give the President a free hand in reshaping and reforming the executive and administrative powers of the Government, already conferred upon him, and to that extent, and that extent only, it gives him dictatorial power. It does not allow him to exercise any authority beyond that which he already has. It only gives to him that freedom of action which the head of any great successful business has in the assigning of duties, the coordinating and correlating of functions among those who are in his behalf exercising the lawful authority already bestowed upon him.

I wish to read again from the testimony of Mr. Catchings before the Military Affairs Committee upon this very point of centralizing, not all power, but executive power, the power that directs. I read from the testimony of Mr. Catchings, on page 1906, of the hearings before the Military Affairs Committee, where he said:

The thing that we are trying to impress upon you—

Upon the committee—

is that the experience of business men has been universally that without central control and responsibility no enterprise, large or small, could succeed.

Very recently—in fact, this morning—I received through the mails a copy of a letter which has been addressed to the President of the United States Senate, dated April 20. This letter contains a copy of resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States at its Chicago meeting on April 10, 11, and 12 of the present year. I shall ask that the resolutions be inserted. I wish, however, to read from them:

Resolved, That we favor prompt action by Congress which will confer upon the President power to bring about for the period of the war such reassignment of functions and readjustment of relations among the various departments and special bureaus actively engaged in war work (as well as the power to create new agencies)—

This bill, of course, does not embrace that power—

as may from time to time prove necessary by changing conditions, to the end that adequate control over the operation of such agencies may be secured; and

Resolved, That the board of directors is hereby requested to continue its efforts for centralization of control and responsibility and to present the views of this chamber to the Chief Executive and to the Congress of the United States of America.

I ask that the full preamble and resolutions may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1918.

The honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you the following resolution upon the subject of "Central control of Government war buying," unanimously adopted at the sixth annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, held in Chicago, Ill., April 10, 11, and 12, 1918.

Very truly, yours.

ELLIOT H. GOODWIN, Secretary.

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of the United States from the beginning of our participation in the war has continuously urged the necessity for centralization of control over the war buying of the Government, in order to secure the best possible results and at the same time protect and conserve the economic strength of the Nation; and

Whereas it seems to us clear that additional legislation is needed to provide such centralization of authority and responsibility:

Resolved, That we favor prompt action by Congress which will confer upon the President power to bring about for the period of the war such reassignment of functions and readjustment of relations among the various departments and special bureaus actively engaged in war work (as well as the power to create new agencies) as may from time to time prove necessary by changing conditions, to the end that adequate control over the operation of such agencies may be secured; and

Resolved, That the board of directors is hereby requested to continue its efforts for centralization of control and responsibility and to present the views of this chamber to the Chief Executive and to the Congress of the United States of America.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, everybody recognizes that there must be a change of some kind in our war machinery. The Military Affairs Committee recognize it. I had intended to go somewhat into detail into the reasons making these changes necessary, but my time is too limited. The Military Affairs Committee recognize the necessity. They brought in here two bills suggesting changes that seemed to them to be wise. All of the witnesses appearing before the Military Affairs Committee—Mr. Baruch, Mr. Willard, Mr. Catchings, Mr. Gifford, and Mr. Coffin, representatives of the best business intelligence of this country—advocated the change centralizing authority in the Executive. The President recognizes it. It seems to me that everybody who has given any thought at all to the question recognizes that something must be done to vitalize the war power, the executive arm of this Government, to enable the President in exercising his functions as Chief Executive and Commander in Chief to have a wide discretion and to coordinate and consolidate the powers which Congress in the exercise of its legislative authority has already conferred upon him.

Shakespeare says in "A Midsummer-Night's Dream":

> Such tricks hath strong imagination,
> That, if it would but apprehend some joy,
> It comprehends some bringer of that joy;
> Or in the night, imagining some fear,
> How easy is a bush suppos'd a bear!

Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senators who have stood upon this floor and denounced the Overman bill because it contains things that are said to be destructive of the best traditions and principles of the American Government, I say they are wandering about in the night, and they are seeing bushes which they imagine to be bears. There is no danger at all in this bill. Those who advocate it have stated frankly what it does. Instead of destroying the executive arm of the Government or the machinery that Congress has constructed, it confers upon the President a power which will bring to bear all the mighty force of America in the struggle in which she is now engaged; and instead of having this dillydallying along through this war, if this bill is passed there will be power vested in the President to gather up the energy of this country and carry it through the fight in the very best and most speedy manner possible.

I sincerely hope that the bill as it came out of the committee will pass.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I shall of necessity be compelled to be brief in what I shall have to say, and owing to the fact that I am limited to 20 minutes, I will ask that I may not be interrupted in the few observations I shall make.

On the 12th day of December last the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate began to hold hearings for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of war preparations, and from that time until now the committee has been almost constantly engaged in this work. Instead of making a report in detail as to what the committee thought was necessary to be done in order to speed up preparations and for a successful prosecution of the war, they embodied their views in two bills—one entitled "A bill to increase and expedite the supply of munitions," which was introduced January 4, 1918, and reported back favorably, with certain amendments, to the Senate on January 18, 1918, and the other was a bill "to establish a war cabinet and to define the jurisdiction and authority thereof." This latter bill was introduced in the Senate on January 21, 1918, and was referred to the committee on January 24, 1918. A majority of the committee seemed in favor of reporting this bill back to the Senate favorably, but it has never been formally reported, and is now pending before the committee.

While these bills were pending before the committee, the Senate may remember that on the 22d of January, 1918, the President issued a public statement in criticism of certain remarks which were made by me in New York in reference to the War Department and of the departments and bureaus of the Government, in which he said, amongst other things:

Nothing helpful or likely to speed or facilitate the war tasks of the Government has come out of such criticism and investigation. I have not been consulted about them and have learned of them only at second hand, but their proposal came after effective measures of reorganization had been thoughtfully and maturely perfected, and inasmuch as these measures have been the result of experience, they are much more likely than any others to be effective, if the Congress will but remove a few statutory obstacles of rigid departmental organization which stand in their way.

From that view, of course, the committee differed, as was evidenced by the bills which they presented for the consideration of the Senate. I thought then and I think now that those bills would have been the best solution of the difficulties which have confronted us nearly ever since we entered the war. One of these bills, creating a director of munitions, would have centralized under one head the purchasing, providing for, supervising, and controlling the procurement, manufacture, transportation, and distribution of munitions of war, which practically included, under the definition contained in the bill, everything that entered into the equipment and mobilization of troops, as well as everything that was necessary to arm and fit these troops for service on the battle line.

With the powers conferred upon him, acting under the authority of the President, he would have had the power to mobilize industrial life as well as the procurement and purchase of all supplies, doing away with the innumerable purchasing agencies of the Government, which were frequently found in the field competing against each other for the things necessary to equip an army. To accomplish these purposes he was vested with the power to coordinate the agencies of the Government and to utilize the services of any such agencies. A condition which confronted the British Army for the first year of war suggested to the committee the creation of a director of munitions, so that America might profit by the mistakes of one of its most powerful allies. It was intended for a helpful measure and not by way of criticism of conditions; and yet none know better than the members of the Military Affairs Committee, who have heard all of the testimony on the subject of our war preparations, that severe criticism might in many instances have been entirely justified.

The Senators will remember that I had the temerity at one time to criticize the departments for inefficiencies, and I was taken severely to task for it in the public statement of the President, to which I call attention, in which he said:

To add, as Senator CHAMBERLAIN did, that there is inefficiency in every department and bureau of the Government, is to show such ignorance of actual conditions as to make it impossible to attach any importance to his statement.

This, however, is past history, and I am only calling attention to it to show that these inefficiencies in the departments and the lack of coordination in nearly all of them, and particularly in the War Department at the time the statement was made, were, in part, the considerations which led the committee to suggest the bills heretofore mentioned. If the criticism which I indulged in displayed an ignorance of actual conditions such as to make it impossible to attach any importance thereto, what must be said of the criticisms of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, who has this pending bill in charge, for he has stated on the floor of the Senate more than once that there were great inefficiencies and defects in all of the departments and bureaus of the Government, and he has quoted the lack of coordination and these inefficiencies, in part at least, as grounds for the enactment of the bill which he has in charge. I think I am justified in saying that these suggestions meet with the approval and espousal of the President himself, as evidenced by a letter which was published a few days ago. The Senator from North Carolina was very properly commended most highly for what he had done in reference to the pending bill.

Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point extracts from the speech of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, made in support of the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the matter will be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, even if these were not war times, I would be in favor of this bill. Everybody familiar with the history of this country knows, and especially, perhaps, I will say to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and those 18 members of the Appropriations Committee, with whom I have the honor to serve, know that there is the most utter confusion and great duplication of work among the departments of this Government. No man knew that or could know it better than former President Taft. Before he became President of the United States he had been Solicitor of the Treasury; he had been Secretary of War; he had been Governor General of the Philippine Islands, and he knew the conditions existing.

In January, 1912, he sent to Congress a message in writing, in which he said that the departments, bureaus, and agencies of the Government had been built up by Congress during a hundred years without any system, without any coordination, and that there was utter confusion and duplication of work everywhere. In response to that message, in which he asked for a hundred thousand dollars to appoint an efficiency commission to look into the matter, the necessary legislation was enacted, and subsequently a report was made by the commission. After reading that report, Mr. Aldrich, a great Senator from the State of Rhode Island, said upon the floor of the Senate that if we would carry on the Government as any business concern is carried on we could save the enormous sum of $300,000,000 annually. Mr. President, if this Government was run according to business methods, he was not far wrong in his statement.

Mr. President, everybody has been making criticism about the "red tape" in the departments. The President wishes to cut it. Let us give him the scissors with which to do so.

Mr. President, before I show the action of President Taft in these matters, which I want to read, let us see what the provisions of this bill are. It has certain provisions and certain limitations. What does it propose to do? Simply, during the term of the war, to redistribute functions. What functions? New functions? No. What functions? Functions that Congress has enacted; functions that it is the duty of the President, as Commander in Chief and as President, to discharge in executing these laws. How shall he execute them? He tells you how he wants to execute them. He does not want new laws or any substantive power, but he wants the authority simply to redistribute these functions, so that he may coordinate the great machinery of this Government, which is now loose, with a monkey wrench in it, with no lubricating oil, and running rusty. He asks you to give him the authority to redistribute these functions, and also authority to transfer certain agencies and to transfer certain persons from one bureau to another. That is about all there is in the bill, with what limitations, Mr. President? Let us see what the limitations are.

For 100 years these departments have been built up with bureaus and agencies having no relation to each other. I say in time of peace they ought to be correlated and coordinated and brought together, and that duplication should stop in this country.

* * * * * * *

Senators, look at these bills that are coming here, estimates by the millions and the billions, made by some department's chief. The President can not look over them. He does not have time to scrutinize them, and he can not do it. That is what Mr. Taft was talking about. The President can not know what is going on. There is nobody to revise what they do—

"Appropriation bills have been without uniformity or common principle governing them; there have been practically no accounts showing what the Government owns, and only a partial representation of what it owes; appropriations have been overencumbered without the facts being known; officers of Government have had no regular or systematic method of having brought to their attention the costs of governmental administration, operation, and maintenance, and therefore could not judge as to the economy or waste; there has been inadequate means whereby those who serve with fidelity and efficiency might make a record of accomplishment and be distinguished from those who were inefficient and wasteful; functions and establishments have been duplicated, even multiplied, a confusing conflict and unnecessary expense; lack of full information has made intelligent direction impossible and cooperation between different branches of the service difficult."

I could stand here and read the report of this commission that Congress created, appropriating $200,000, and showing the confusion existing and woeful wasting of money by duplication of work. I wish Senators would read it to show the confusion and the want of correlation and coordination in every one of these departments, bureaus, commissions, and agencies which Congress has from time to time established without any scientific ideas of government. We have the most unscientific Government in the world.

Mr. President, within the last 12 months we have appropriated more than $23,000,000,000 without a financial policy. Estimates for departmental expenditures have literally poured into Congress day by day without any centralized scrutiny, revision, or control. The President has no power and no organization to sift them down to the rock-bottom needs of the Government. The estimates for appropriations are being sent into Congress according to old statutory regulations made to meet the needs of other days when the entire expense of the Government was less than half a billion dollars a year. There has been no readjustment of our methods of finance since we entered the war. The Public Treasury bears a relationship to the conduct of the war in no less a degree than the Army and the Navy. A strong financial policy, worked out and enforced with vigor and efficiency, is absolutely necessary to insure the proper carrying out of the military and naval program.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The enactment of the pending bill is urged for these and other defects in the bureaus and departments of the Government, and it is proposed therein to vest in the President substantially the same powers that were proposed in the director of munitions bill, reported upon favorably by the Military Affairs Committee and now on the calendar of the Senate, so that he might coordinate the different bureaus and agencies of the Government through such agency as he might see fit to appoint; and I want to say now that, while I still feel and believe that the director of munitions bill was the best solution of a question which it is now sought to adjust by the pending measure, I shall nevertheless support the bill that has been presented by the President through the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, although I would prefer to see the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal banking system exempted from its operations; I shall vote for an amendment looking to that end, but, whether it is adopted or not, I shall support the pending measure, because in principle it embodies the purposes of the two bills which had the favorable consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs.

I do not share with some of my colleagues the fear that the President will abuse the power which is sought to be given him here, however much at times I may have differed from him in reference to important matters of policy and of legislation, nor however unjust I may feel that he has been toward me personally in reference to these matters. I have absolute confidence in his integrity of purpose, and am sure that he will do all in his power under the provisions of the bill to make America fit to fight; and wherever there are errors made, they will be errors of judgment and not of heart. I shall vote, therefore, to give him all the power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States that he deems necessary to enable him to successfully prosecute the war. And I believe I may say for the committee that whether they favor the pending measure or not, it will not be the disposition of the committee to undertake to press the bills which the committee favor and so attempt to place in the hands of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy implements which in this emergency he says he does not want.

May I insert, Mr. President, a short statement from the War Cabinet Report for the Year 1917, presented to Parliament by command of His Majesty, the King of England, on the subject of the ministry of munitions in 1917?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the matter will be inserted without reading.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"By the end of 1916 the main manufacturing program of the ministry of munitions, including the establishment of the national factories, had already reached fruition, and, as had been demonstrated from the beginning of the Battle of the Somme in July, the new organization was capable of producing a huge volume of supplies. During the year 1917 this manufacturing capacity still further matured, and the volume of output has been maintained and extended. Moreover, the administrative experience of two years has established a definite method and procedure which renders possible an ever-increasing accuracy of adjustment and forecast. It would be hard to overemphasize the importance to the army and its leaders of this growing confidence in the undertakings of the ministry of munitions.

"As the demand has increased so the ambit of the control exercised by the ministry has widened. Fresh trades, processes, stages of manufactures, and sources of supply have been brought within its sphere, and what was at first almost exclusively a manufacturing problem becomes more and more, as the limit of expansion is approached, a problem of securing raw materials, transport, and man power.

"In Mr. Churchill's words:

"'The conditions under which the ministry of munitions was created were those of intense war emergency. The vital need for supplying the armies in the field with adequate, abundant, and finally overwhelming supplies of ammunition, guns, and war material of all kinds necessitated and justified every expedient and the suspension of all ordinary rules. The immense and then unmeasured resources of the United Kingdom afforded an ample field for the enterprise and energy of departmental direction and for the organizing capacity and bold initiative of British business men. Supplies were freely drawn from all parts of the Empire and purchases from neutral States were used to supplement any deficiencies. As new needs arose they were met. Department was added to department. Military requirements were not only satisfied but anticipated. Vast programs were successfully carried through. The British armies became the best equipped and most formidably armed in Europe. This process still continues and will become increasingly pronounced.

"'But after these great efforts, and in the fourth year of the war, we are no longer tapping the stored-up resources of national industry or mobilizing them and applying them for the first time of war. The magnitude of the effort and of the achievement approximates continually to the limits of possibility. Already in many directions the frontiers are in sight. It is, therefore, not necessary simply to expand, but to go back over ground already covered, and by more economical processes, by closer organization, and by thrifty and harmonious methods to glean and gather a further reinforcement of war power.'"

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, from this statement it will be seen that the ministry of munitions in Great Britain has done a great work, although it was not deemed necessary to create it until some time after the war was entered upon.

The bill now pending, Mr. President, has for its purpose, amongst others, the coordinating of the different agencies of the Government in order to greater efficiency, just as that was the purpose of the bill to create a director of munitions, and I have no doubt but that if the bill passes it will be accomplished. As a matter of fact, the President on the 4th of March, 1918, designated Mr. Bernard M. Baruch as chairman of the War Industries Board, defining the functions of the board and the duties of the chairman at length; and the powers and duties therein conferred are practically those that would have been conferred upon the director of munitions under the bill intended to create such an officer.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, as a part of my remarks a copy of the letter of the President referred to, together with the organization and functions of the Requirements Division of the War Industries Board, which has been accomplished under the letter referred to, and also the Commodity Sections of the War Industries Board, with the personnel in charge of each subject, as it was recently furnished me by the chairman of the board.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 4 March, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. BARUCH: I am writing to ask if you will not accept appointment as chairman of the War Industries Board, and I am going to take the liberty at the same time of outlining the functions, the constitution, and action of the board as I think they should now be established.

The functions of the board should be:

(1) The creation of new facilities and the disclosing—if necessary, the opening up—of new or additional sources of supply.

(2) The conversion of existing facilities, where necessary, to new uses.

(3) The studious conservation of resources and facilities by scientific, commercial, and industrial economies.

(4) Advice to the several purchasing agencies of the Government with regard to the prices to be paid.

(5) The determination, wherever necessary, of priorities of production and of delivery and of the proportions of any given article to be made immediately accessible to the several purchasing agencies when the supply of that article is insufficient, either temporarily or permanently.

(6) The making of purchases for the allies.

The board should be constituted as at present and should retain, so far as necessary and so far as consistent with the character and purposes of the reorganization, its present advisory agencies; but the ultimate decision of all questions, except the determination of prices, should rest always with the chairman, the other members acting in a cooperative and advisory capacity. The further organization of advice I will indicate below.

In the determination of priorities of production, when it is not possible to have the full supply of any article that is needed produced at once, the chairman should be assisted, and so far as practicable guided, by the present priorities organization or its equivalent.

In the determination of priorities of delivery, when they must be determined, he should be assisted when necessary, in addition to the present advisory priorities organization, by the advice and cooperation of a committee constituted for the purpose, and consisting of official representatives of the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the Railway Administration, the Shipping Board, and the War Trade Board, in order that when a priority of delivery has been determined there may be common, consistent, and concerted action to carry it into effect.

In the determination of prices the chairman should be governed by the advice of a committee consisting, besides himself, of the members of the board immediately charged with the study of raw materials and of manufactured products, of the labor member of the board, of the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, the chairman of the Tariff Commission, and the Fuel Administrator.

The chairman should be constantly and systemmatically informed of all contracts, purchases, and deliveries, in order that he may have always before him a schematized analysis of the progress of business in the several supply divisions of the Government in all departments.

The duties of the chairman are:

(1) To act for the joint and several benefit of all the supply departments of the Government.

(2) To let alone what is being successfully done and interfere as little as possible with the present normal processes of purchase and delivery in the several departments.

(3) To guide and assist wherever the need for guidance or assistance may be revealed; for example, in the allocation of contracts, in obtaining access to materials in any way preempted, or in the disclosure of sources of supply.

(4) To determine what is to be done when there is any competitive or other conflict of interest between departments in the matter of supplies; for example, when there is not a sufficient immediate supply for all and there must be a decision as to priority of need or delivery, or when there is competition for the same source of manufacture or supply, or when contracts have not been placed in such a way as to get advantage of the full productive capacity of the country.

(5) To see that contracts and deliveries are followed up where such assistance as is indicated under (3) and (4) above has proved to be necessary.

(6) To anticipate the prospective needs of the several supply departments of the Government and their feasible adjustment to the industry of the country as far in advance as possible, in order that as definite an outlook and opportunity for planning as possible may be afforded the business men of the country.

In brief, he should act as the general eye of all supply departments in the field of industry.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

ORGANIZATION AND FUNCTIONS OF REQUIREMENTS DIVISION OF WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD.

In order that the responsibilities which the President has laid upon the chairman of the War Industries Board, as outlined in his letter of March 4, 1918, may be discharged there has been created a "requirements division" of the said board, to which each supply division of each department of this Government and the allied purchasing commission shall furnish, "as far in advance as possible," statements with as much detail as practicable of their "prospective needs" of raw materials and finished products. The President has decreed that the chairman is to be constantly and systematically informed of all contracts and purchases in order that he may have always before him a schematized analysis of the progress of business in the several divisions of the Government in all the departments, and in order that this may be accomplished the statements above mentioned will include not only those commodities, materials, or products, of which a present or threatened shortage exists, but also those of which the supply is ample, and will also include not only commodities, materials, and products required by several different departments or nations, but also those required by one department only.

In the procurement of materials and finished products in which no shortage exists and where no allocation seems necessary or desirable, the requirements division will so advise the department presenting the requirements, which will thereupon proceed with the purchase in pursuance with their established practice.

NOTICE OF REQUIREMENTS.

Section 1. The statements above mentioned will from time to time and as far in advance as possible of the date required, be presented to the requirements division by the member or members thereof representing the department in which the requirements originate, or by the representative of the allied purchasing commission. Where the requirements are novel or unusual either with respect to the amount of the proposed expenditure, quantities involved, or location proposed, or where the requirements division for any reason deems it desirable that the project be considered in conference between the head of the department in which it originates and the chairman of the War Industries Board, the matter shall be immediately called to the attention of the chairman of the War Industries Board, and also submitted to the board at its next meeting without, however, delaying reference to and consideration by the appropriate commodity section.

COMMODITY SECTIONS.

Section 2. The chairman of the War Industries Board shall utilize existing sections and, where necessary, create additional sections to handle raw materials and finished products, of which there is an actual or threatened shortage, or the price and production of which should be controlled, in order that the United States Government, its allies, and the civilian population may be protected as far as possible. These sections shall be designated "commodity sections" and each shall be in charge of an executive officer to be designated "chief" of such section.

Each section chief shall create and maintain such organization and keep such records as may be prescribed by the authority appointing him.

MEMBERS OF COMMODITY SECTIONS.

Section 3. There shall be attached to each commodity section representatives (hereinafter called members) of each of the supply departments of the Government interested in the commodity in question. Each member shall be named by his department head. Since each member will have regular duties to perform in connection with the supply department which he represents, he will therefore give to the commodity section to which he is attached only so much time as may be necessary to perform the duties herein prescribed, and will not be charged with the executive conduct of the business of the section, but will have access to all data and information collected by the section, and will in turn supply the section with all information he may have or can procure pertaining to the commodity in question.

DUTIES OF COMMODITY.

Section 4. Upon receipt from the requirements division of statements embodying the requirements of any department of this Government or of its allies, it shall be the duty of the chief of the section to carefully study and consider same, and procure from all available sources information and data which will be helpful in the allocation of such requirements. Meetings of each commodity section shall be called by the chief thereof at such times as will interfere as little as possible with the other duties of the members; at such meetings the requirements referred to the section shall be considered, and wherever possible the allocation of materials or facilities to meet such requirements shall be determined. In the event any member is dissatisfied with the decision reached he may, at his election, file a protest with the section chief and also with the head of his division or department. The latter may, at his election, appeal to the War Industries Board, whose decision, after giving all interested parties an opportunity to be heard, shall be final, subject only to modification by agreement between the chairman of the War Industries Board and the respective Secretaries of War and the Navy and the chairman of the Shipping Board to the extent of their respective interests. A record of each meeting will be preserved in the office of the chief of the section, the decisions reached at meetings will be reduced to writing in a succinct form, and a copy thereof will be transmitted to (1) the chairman of the requirements division; (2) to each member of the section; (3) to the director of Army purchases; (4) to the Paymaster General of the Navy; (5) to the vice president and general manager of the Emergency Fleet Corporation; (6) to the priorities commissioner; and (7) to such other official or officials as may be from time to time designated by the chairman of the War Industries Board.

Each commodity section will also from time to time consider the necessity for expansion of existing sources of production or the creation of new facilities and the disclosing, if necessary the opening up, of additional sources of supply and the conversion of existing facilities to new uses.

Each section chief will be charged with the responsibility of collecting from the several departments of the Government, from the manufacturers and producers and from committees representing them, and especially from the war service committee, or committees created under the supervision of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and from any and all other reliable and available sources information concerning the production of the particular commodity or commodities with which his section has to deal, including available supplies, new sources of supply, methods for increasing production, etc. These data and information will at all times be available to the several interested departments, the price committee, the priorities committee, and any other agency that may be designated by the chairman of the War Industries Board.

Each commodity section shall consider market conditions pertaining to the materials or commodities over which it has jurisdiction, and shall, where deemed advisable, recommend purchase plans to the several purchasing departments. In cases where it becomes necessary to control an industry in whole or in part by means of allotments the appropriate section will determine the allotments of materials, commodities, and facilities to the several departments of this Government and to its allies, and also the extent to which manufacturers and others, whether serving the civilian population or engaged in the manufacture of war supplies, shall be rationed.

SPECIAL COMMODITY SECTIONS.

Section 5. Where the requirements deal with a commodity listed, where a shortage exists or where an allocation seems desirable, but for which no regular section has been established, such requirements will be considered by a special section created for such purpose by the requirements division, which shall perform the same functions as are performed by the regular commodity section.

PRIORITIES.

Section 6. When a commodity section comes to make its final report on the allocation of any specific requirements, the chief of such section shall notify a member of the priorities committee, to be designated for such purpose by the priorities commissioner, who shall, with the section chief and the member, consider and tentatively determine the priority rating which such requirements shall take when orders therefor shall have been placed. Such tentative rating shall be observed by the priorities committee in connection with all applications for priority on orders covering such requirements unless the priorities committee should (because of conditions changing in the time intervening between the time of the fixing of the tentative rating and the application for priorities, or other good causes) conclude such rating to be improper; in which event the section chief and each member of the section fixing the tentative rating shall be notified and have an opportunity to be heard before such rating shall be charged. In the event a change is made, the section chief or any member may appeal from such decision in the manner prescribed by that portion of the organization plan of the War Industries Board governing priorities.

Section 7. It shall be no part of the task of the War Industries Board to make inspections of products for which orders have been placed, to keep in touch with production, or follow up delays, which duties devolve upon the several governmental supply departments. Each supply department, however, will promptly and fully advise the requirements division whenever serious delays in deliveries or shortages in requirements occur or are threatened.

Section 8. The requirements division shall be composed of Mr. Alex. Legge, chairman; Mr. James Inglis, executive secretary; Mr. Edwin B. Parker, priorities; Mr. George N. Peek, finished products; Mr. J. Leonard Replogle, iron, steel, and steel products; Mr. L. L. Summers, chemicals and explosives; Mr. Pope Yeatman, nonferrous metals; Mr. J. A. Carr, representing allied purchasing commission; one or more representatives of the War Department; one or more representatives of the Navy Department; one or more representatives of the United States Shipping Board, Emergency Fleet Corporation; and a representative of the railroad administration.

The chairman of the War Industries Board shall from time to time agree with the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the chairman of the Shipping Board, respectively, as to the number of representatives from their respective departments, and when the number shall have been so determined such representatives shall be selected by the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the chairman of the Shipping Board, respectively.

The Fuel Administrator, the Food Administrator, and the American Red Cross shall each designate a representative who shall attend meetings of the requirements division whenever they are prepared to present plans or projects under consideration, the consummation of which will require materials, supplies, facilities, electrical power, fuel, or transportation affecting the industries of the United States.

MEETINGS.

Section 9. Meetings of the members of this division shall be held in the office of its chairman at 9.30 a. m. each day, at which all advices of requirements received since the preceding meeting and all other matters affecting requirements in which the members of the division as a whole shall be interested will be considered, after which the statements of requirements shall be segregated as far as need be, and referred by the executive secretary to the appropriate commodity section.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to state that the appointment of a chairman of the War Industries Board, with power to act with finality, and whose decision is practically final, meets with my hearty approval, and I am of the opinion, from what I have seen of the present chairman, that he will render to the Government in this great emergency distinguished and effective service. He shows a disposition now to take the bit in his own teeth, determined to cut away from red-tape methods which have so enmeshed officials in the past as to make progress physically impossible.

I believe that under his management and under the powers likely to be conferred upon him if the pending bill passes, he will do for this Government what it has lacked for the last few years, and that is a force capable not only of organizing our industrial life so that there might be a maximum of production of all that is necessary for a successful prosecution of the war but coordinating as well the purchase of all materials for the Government in the best and most effective way.

I am led to a brief discussion now of the pending measure in connection with the bill proposed by the Military Committee to create a director of munitions for the reason that there was a disposition in some quarters to criticize the committee for presenting their bill to the Senate, and to say that such criticism was unwarranted, because the pending measure appears to have followed very closely along the same lines as the one proposed by that committee, and is based upon the same considerations as those which moved the committee to action.

I believe that the Senate and the country will agree with me that the investigation held by the Military Affairs Committee has resulted in relieving many inefficients from duty in the war establishment. At nearly every place in the department where there was lack of coordination, whether in the Ordnance, Quartermaster's, or other bureaus, there has been almost a complete reorganization, with the result that men have been placed at the head of these bureaus of known capacity for doing things, and prominent civilians have been named to assist in every part of the service.

Of the men of affairs who testified before the Military Committee in support of centralized power and authority were such men as Mr. Daniel Willard, Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, Mr. Waddill Catchings, and Mr. W. S. Gifford, and I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD statements from these gentlemen, giving their views as to the necessity of this centralized control. It is the principle involved in the bill for the creation of a director of munitions and it is the principle involved in the pending bill, though it is possible that the pending measure goes a little further than these gentlemen insisted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. Daniel Willard testified, amongst other things, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Did you, in the course of your duties in connection with the advisory committee, as its chairman, ascertain that there was any lack of coordination in the various governmental departments, like the Quartermaster General's Department and the Ordnance Department and the Department of the Navy? I am speaking of the supply departments.

Mr. WILLARD. I think that was generally recognized. It was a feature of the system to be expected. There were some 10 or 12 separate purchasing agencies, and no machinery had been provided to bring about coordination.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, these different agencies were sometimes in the field as competitiors for the same commodity?

Mr. WILLARD. That was a matter of no special concern when there was a sufficient quantity of the commodity to go around. In times of peace very little trouble came from that, but in times of war they soon exhausted the supply, and then it was necessary, of course, that some other agency should be developed to prevent destructive competition and stimulate production.

The CHAIRMAN. What agency was developed?

Mr. WILLARD. Such agency as exists at the present was the outgrowth of the advisory commission. That is the agency to-day that is trying to meet the situation.

* * * * * * *

Mr. WILLARD. In common with a good many people, I suppose, I thought one of the first things we should have done after entering the war was to provide for what people are in the habit of speaking of as a minister of munitions.

That term had been used in England and, as I understood it, I thought that would be the thing that we ought to have here to meet this situation. When I became chairman of the War Industries Board I still held that same opinion. I thought there ought to be a minister of munitions. I did not think this plan would work.

I discussed the matter with the Secretary of War, and he said that there were undoubtedly defects in this plan, but before definitely deciding that question, or, rather, he hoped I would keep my mind open on the subject until we had seen if it might not be possible to correct the defects of this plan, finding out first of all what the defects were.

While I had very little confidence that we could make this plan work at first, I undertook to approach it as he desired. Of course, it was clear that if we were not to have a central outside purchasing agency, one purchasing agency, to do all of these things, then the next thing to do was to make the existing agencies the most efficient possible. We had to look to that.

We went through—I say "we." We had many discussions—Gen. Wheeler, Gen. Goethals, Secretary Baker, Col. McRoberts, and others—trying to find out just what could be done with the organizations we had.

Assuming that the 12 or 14 purchasing departments of the Army and Navy can and will be put on an efficient basis, and then that the five purchase departments of the Army will be brought into one head, as proposed, under Col. Pierce, and the several departments of the Navy brought under one head, as is proposed, and it does not require much change there, then we will have in effect the Army and Navy, the Shipping Board, and the allied purchasing agency as the four large buying agencies here in our markets.

To prevent competition between those agencies it is necessary to have some outside body to coordinate, or do what you may call it. The War Industries Board is intended to meet that situation.

To determine questions of priority, or relative urgency, having decided to buy something, to determine who shall have it first, is the function that has to be performed by some outside agency, and the War Industries Board is doing that.

Then there still remains the necessity of developing sources of raw material, and the War Industries Board is provided to do that.

The question of developing sources of finished products, or capacity for finished products, the War Industries Board is provided to do.

And then the much more important question of conversion of industries in order to prevent too much disturbance of industry, and we have already provided to do that.

This plan, with the personnel that goes with it, and the functions of the War Industries Board as they are now working it, will work. It can work, it can be made to work, but it is faulty in just one way. After all, it is purely voluntary; that is the weakness of it.

If everyone would cooperate, this plan could be made to work. It covers it all. I do not think it is necessary that one man should do all the immense volume of purchasing that is being done by our Government. I do not know that it is a practicable thing to do. They do not do that in England.

Mr. Bernard M. Baruch testified, amongst other things, as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. In what other respect do you think the general plan should go further?

Mr. BARUCH. I think that the purchases should be centralized in one agency, directly under the President, and not as a Cabinet officer.

Senator WADSWORTH. Not as a Cabinet officer?

Mr. BARUCH. I do not think that is necessary, because I look upon this as a war measure and one that should cease with the war.

Senator WADSWORTH. Do you think that agency should be established by law for the duration of the war, or for a short period thereafter—a reasonable period thereafter?

Mr. BARUCH. Yes, sir; if necessary, for a period long enough after the war to give an opportunity for this individual or agency to help demobilize the industry, which is just as important as the mobilization.

* * * * * * *

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Baruch, under your suggestion who is going to direct the various activities of these committees? The President does not have time.

Mr. BARUCH. No; this agency that is to be established.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. The War Industries Board?

Mr. BARUCH. Some call it one and some another.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. Whatever it is.

Mr. BARUCH. I say an individual.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. You say an individual?

Mr. BARUCH. Yes, sir.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. Then, practically, he would be a minister of munitions, because he would practically govern and control all of these various committees having to do with the purchase of all war supplies.

Mr. BARUCH. That minister of munitions is rather an abused term, in my mind. I would go further than the English system.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. In what way?

Mr. BARUCH. As I understand it, the Admiralty is not under the minister of munitions.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. You would put all buying under one head?

Mr. BARUCH. Yes, sir. I would not interfere, for instance, with the agency we have in the Navy, where the buying is all centralized, and in the view that I have, and as I understand it, I would not in any way destroy most of the agencies that have already been established and are in process of establishment.

Senator MCKELLAR. You would take those in the Army and in the Navy and put them under one head and centralize them?

Mr. BARUCH. Yes.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. And make all of those committees subservient to one authority?

Mr. BARUCH. Yes, sir.

Senator WADSWORTH. Will you develop before the committee your ideas as to the most efficient kind of organization we could have to carry on the industrial efforts that this country must put forth during the next few years, because, if I may say so, I am one of those who believe that this is an enormous industrial contest.

Mr. BARUCH. In that I concur.

Senator WADSWORTH. And that we can not bring our strength to bear in the proportion that it should be brought to bear unless we organize our industries and our sources of supply and our means of transportation.

Mr. BARUCH. I think the efforts of the advisory commission in the beginning were an evidence of the fact that they thought this was an industrial war, because they reached out in the quick and only way they could, to try to reach those industries, the only agencies they could possibly think of.

Senator WADSWORTH. Will you go ahead in your own way and tell us what you think of this situation?

Mr. BARUCH. I presume what you wish me to express an opinion upon is this agency to be established?

Senator WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BARUCH. As I said before, I believe that you should have a highly centralized authority created, acting under the direction of the President. He undoubtedly would use this agency. It may be in the form of an individual or a commission.

Senator MCKELLAR. Which would you prefer?

Mr. BARUCH. A single authority, sir.

Senator MCKELLAR. An individual?

Mr. BARUCH. With full authority, so responsibility can be fixed definitely. The difficulty with divided authority is that you do not know where to fix the responsibility.

Senator MCKELLAR. I agree with you thoroughly. Go right ahead.

Mr. BARUCH. It seems to be in the minds of many to destroy many of the splendid things that have been done, but in my opinion it would not be necessary, and I must concur with Mr. Willard and say that whereas there may be things and there are things to criticize, there has been a lot done.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think the committee feels that all of this system should be abolished.

Senator WADSWORTH. Not at all. Utilize wherever possible.

Mr. BARUCH. I believe it should be utilized. As I said, a great many of these agencies are in the right direction, but they have not gone far enough, and they ought to go further, so as to have this definitely fixed in this individual acting under authority, because all of the authority should be given to the President; that is, a man who is responsible.

* * * * * * *

Senator NEW. Mr. Baruch, the Secretary of War, in testifying here a day or two ago, gave it as his opinion that the creation of this central agency would create an impossible task for the man put at the head of it; that you could not find anybody who could carry through the plan, substantially the plan that you are proposing, as I understand it. I would like to ask your opinion as to that.

Mr. BARUCH. I differ with you.

Senator NEW. You differ with me?

The CHAIRMAN. He is doing it now, is he not? He is the head now?

Mr. BARUCH. Yes, sir. He might be correct. That is a difference of opinion.

Senator NEW. But you differ with him in your view of that?

Mr. BARUCH. I do not think this individual man could do all of the things himself. I believe in centralizing the authority and decentralizing the execution of the authority.

Senator MCKELLAR. Then you think it would be perfectly all right to have immediately under this centralized individual authority the various departments as they now exist; for instance, the Quartermaster General's Department, Chief of Ordnance, Chief of Engineers, Chief Signal Officer, and the Surgeon General, acting directly under that individual. Is that correct?

Mr. BARUCH. Yes; and he may not interfere with their activities at all.

Senator MCKELLAR. And your idea is that he would just simply use those agencies, changing them to make them more effectual and to coordinate them and to bring about the very best results. Is that your plan?

Mr. BARUCH. Quite right, sir.

Mr. W. S. Gifford testified:

The CHAIRMAN. What do you find in this whole category of preparing for war as the great desideratum? What is there lacking to make the War Department and the Navy Department a coordinated whole for the purpose of the war?

Mr. GIFFORD. I think, Senator, it is very much the subject I was just talking about. It is a lack of one program and one executive authority for dealing with these war industries. It is a lack of dealing with the industries of the country and getting all the production from these industries of the country. I do not believe that this abnormal expansion or conversion of facilities meets the needs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Council of National Defense is a legal body created by law, but there are many functions it performs through various committees that are practically voluntary organizations.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. And it depends entirely on the voluntary efforts for the proper performance of the duties. In other words, being a voluntary organization, it may quit if it wants to. There is no compulsion.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not know that there is any compulsion. Even the hired man, or the man who gets more than a dollar a year, is not compelled to serve. I do not know that I quite get your point.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no responsible directing head to any of these organizations, is there?

Mr. GIFFORD. I would not say that, Senator, but it is obvious that it is a good deal more difficult to have a responsible directing head of an organization made up of volunteers than an organization made up of staff people.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think there should be a central head?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, sir; I do. I am now referring, however, wholly to the war industries situation and not to those other activities of the Council of National Defense.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you see the program mapped out by the Secretary of War for coordination?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes sir; I have seen it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything lacking about that to make it a perfect system?

Mr. GIFFORD. Nothing but the power to carry it into effect. If this still remains under the Council of National Defense——

The CHAIRMAN. The President is at the head and the Council of National Defense comes next.

Mr. GIFFORD. The Council of National Defense has no power, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. But under his diagram, he gives it power, does he not?

Mr. GIFFORD. This diagram must necessarily; yes, sir. We must assume, I suppose, that the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, our allies, and our Shipping Board will, because the President requests it, refer certain matters to this body for advice and adjudication, but it certainly has no legal power to definitely do anything except to tell the Army what it thinks it should do.

The CHAIRMAN. It is still an advisory proposition?

Mr. GIFFORD. It would seem so to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Willard testified that the great weakness of that system as proposed by the Secretary of War was that the Council of National Defense, the War Industries Board, the administrative division, and the clearance committee, all of which intervene between the President and the Army, had no directing power. They simply act in an advisory capacity. What do you think?

Mr. GIFFORD. I think that is so. I agree with that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there anything that can be substituted in place of those four bodies?

Mr. GIFFORD. My view would be that if the President had the power to appoint a director on the War Industries Board, I would prefer one man. I would prefer a one-man board, where direct executive work could be done. Then, if it were made possible by Executive order, we will say, for the President to transfer from the War Department, the Navy Department, or the Shipping Board, any purchasing committee which it might develop should properly be centralized from those departments into this section, as the scheme works along, we would transfer such things as had to be centralized, such as steel, for instance. No one questions, for instance, that steel will have to be centralized. It will have to be centralized somewhere. We can not have it handled by the Army, the Shipping Board, the Navy, and our allies. If they could be transferred out of the various departments and put under direct war industries, you would have a workable organization that would not be so comprehensive and so detailed as to break down in its functioning, and yet you would attain the object of taking care of these vital needs, which I call the war industries.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose you had a central head. It does not make any difference what you call him. If we could empower him, under the rules and regulations to be adopted by the President, the President being the supreme head, to utilize all the branches of the Government, wouldn't that be better than to rely upon these different agencies to do it under a volunteer system? Would it not be better to have one direct head with power to call to his assistance the Council of National Defense, the War Industries Board, the administrative division, the clearance committee, or any other agencies?

Mr. GIFFORD. I think so. I do not think that the war industries under that scheme would need it.

The CHAIRMAN. You would not need it?

Mr. GIFFORD. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, this organization would still be continued by a director of war industries who had the power. He could continue it as it is or change it when it suited his convenience.

Mr. GIFFORD. I think in putting one man in charge it would be much better to make the change a gradual one. A man could not try to take all of the departments, have a sort of picture puzzle, and put the whole thing into one department, but any scheme of this kind would work better, I think, by taking the thing over as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. And let the man in charge make the changes gradually?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not say that any strong man would undertake to wipe this off the map and do away with it altogether and organize the subdivisions.

Mr. GIFFORD. If he did, and he would be right about it, then we have been working along the wrong lines.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume that any man who was put in charge would undertake to retain those organizations and eliminate them by degrees where the elimination seems proper.

Mr. GIFFORD. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. That is your opinion?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, sir.

I think if you have not seen this it would be interesting if I mentioned this article in the New York Times of December 30 relative to the English situation. I have given a great deal of study to this question. I find that there have been some misunderstandings about it here.

The CHAIRMAN. You have studied the English system?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, sir. This article says, on the subject of purchases for the Government, that the subject has received the attention of the Associated Chambers of Commerce in England, and a memorandum has been prepared which has been submitted to the various ministers:

"The council desires to record its opinion that such diversity of control, which permits competitive purchasing, does not make for economical and efficient national production. They are informed that orders for supplies are placed by the ministry of munitions, the Admiralty, the war office, and the air board, acting as the chief services, and that each of these has separate departments which operate, frequently without consultation, in competition with each other."

Now, I think we can do better than that.

The CHAIRMAN. What would you suggest?

Mr. GIFFORD. I think this scheme is better, with the power.

The CHAIRMAN. With the power?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; a good deal better.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean that the system that the Secretary of War has worked out is better?

Mr. GIFFORD. This system, with the single man at the top, with power to say to the Army and Navy, "Now, beginning such and such a date all explosives will be handled so and so." Then it may develop, as I said, that you had better say that all matters relating to gun forgings will be taken out of the Ordnance Department.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think there is any question about that, although there is a difference of opinion.

Senator BECKHAM. Does the English director of munitions purchase for the Admiralty?

Mr. GIFFORD. No, sir.

Senator BECKHAM. How do they avoid competition?

Mr. GIFFORD. They do not. They have the same trouble we have, after three and a half years of war.

The CHAIRMAN. You have so much to do and so many troubles of your own that I doubt if you have had time to look at this bill.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have read a number of them, Senator.

The CHAIRMAN. I wish you would take one of the bills, or take them all, if you will, or you might take the one before this committee as a basis, and make such changes in it, by way of suggestion, as you think would carry out the things that you have in view. The committee has not committed itself to any plan, and we want your help.

Mr. GIFFORD. I would be very glad to give it.

The CHAIRMAN. The central thought is a central figure of power to do these things.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. Waddill Catchings testified:

Senator WADSWORTH. What impressions have you derived from your observation of the conditions during the last six or seven months in your conversations with business men and your observations in the departments?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think, Mr. Senator, that this statement expresses the views of business men universally, that they are impressed with a lack of central control and responsibility and of general planning in connection with the work.

Senator WADSWORTH. What effect does that lack of central control have upon the situation?

Mr. CATCHINGS. It has the effect that we set forth in the statement, in our judgment, a very harmful effect in that our program is not balanced. We do not believe that one activity is properly related to another.

It has been manifest, in our judgment, for months that the shipping program was the principal program, and yet there has been no effective method of giving that program the right of way or the support which it should have, and we are clearly not producing the ships and will not produce the ships for many months which we would have produced in our judgment, had there been some effective method of getting singleness of action.

Senator HITCHCOCK. Has that been the fault of the personnel of the Shipping Board or, rather, the fault of the system?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I want to express very emphatically the judgment of all of us repeatedly stated that it is not a question of personnel in any respect, but that you are endeavoring to conduct the war with machinery that is utterly inadequate and could not be made successful, in our judgment, by any men.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that not indicated in this as well as in many other instances. It is said now on testimony that seems to us unimpeachable that there are 127 vessels in New York ready to be loaded and ready to transport supplies across the Atlantic, but that they can not get coal. Is not that a lack of coordination somewhere that should not exist?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes. In our judgment a condition such as that is inevitable from the present method of conducting affairs. In our judgment a planning for coal for ships in December in New York Harbor should be made in June or July of the year before, and it is utterly impossible to handle situations of this sort when they arise.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, there should be a program laid down and worked to?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Absolutely; and in our judgment no program can be laid down unless there is centralized control and responsibility. At the present time there is none. It is an indisputable fact that there is no one actually engaged in the formulation of a broad program concerning all of our efforts in connection with the war. In our judgment, we are engaged in the greatest enterprise that has ever confronted any nation, and in that enterprise we are failing to observe the fundamentals of success of any enterprise, however small or large, which is to have some one actively in charge of the enterprise, planning in regard to its difficulties, foreseeing them, making arrangements to meet them. At the present time, through our organization which existed in time of peace, we have a great many independent activities doing surprisingly well under the conditions with individual features of the situation, but we absolutely have no general control or program of any sort. It appears every day. It is not open to dispute. I doubt if there is a man closely in touch with the situation here who feels that there is any adequate central control at the present time

Senator WADSWORTH. What effect does this lack of centralization and control have upon the several industries who are anxious to assist the Government?

Mr. CATCHINGS. We have, Mr. Senator, approached this situation largely from that standpoint. In our judgment the situation in industry is most unfortunate. We are having withdrawn from industry an amount of labor and material which is measured by the gigantic sum of $19 000 000,000. I doubt if the gross output of all of our business of every sort and description has ever exceeded $45,000,000,000 to $50,000,000,000. Certainly it has never exceeded $80,000,000,000. I think that can be taken unquestionably as an outside figure. We know that the total value of all the wealth of the United States is not more than $225,000,000,000. Now, we are going to withdraw from our industry in one year, according to the program, one-tenth, approximately, of all our total wealth. We are going to withdraw one-half of our annual output.

That means just as we have recognized in industry and have declared for months, industrial effort must be subordinated to these war-time activities, and we have no guide. We are on a sea without a chart. Our experience is no longer helpful. We have no longer the play of supply and demand to guide us. No man can foresee what conditions are going to exist in business in two or three months. He has no way of knowing. All of our experience is suddenly cast aside, and we have been declaring for months that in this situation there is need for a definite, clear, positive program on the part of the Government.

There must be some kind of leadership in this situation. We have a very great fear with regard to industry. We fear that there is going to be a reduction in output along many lines of so-called nonessentials in favor of the production of essentials. We believe that it is quite likely that that production of essentials will be far beyond any possibility of transportation to the other side, and that that will result in an interruption in the production of essentials, and that then, having stopped your production of so-called nonessentials and being able no longer to produce essentials because you can not transport them to France, we believe that we will be facing a very disastrous and serious situation.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Speaking for the United States Chamber of Commerce, it seemed to us well that we come to you with definite approval of what we have to say; and this statement which I am about to read was prepared with the unanimous support of our committee and approved with a unanimous vote of the board of directors at the chamber of commerce at its meeting on yesterday, so that in this statement we are voicing the regularly secured opinion of the body. [Reading:]

"Your committee was originally constituted on June 12, 1917, as the committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on cooperation with the Council of National Defense. The chairman of your committee, by resolution of the Council of National Defense, was appointed assistant to its director, with no duties, however, except those arising as chairman of the chamber's committee. The appointment was made to enable your committee to familiarize itself with the methods employed by the Council of National Defense, the Government's requirements for war materials and supplies, to assist in organizing industry for war service, and to transmit to the industries of the country such information as would make it practicable to produce the needed materials and supplies with as little disturbance as possible to sound industrial conditions.

"It soon became evident that, notwithstanding the intimate relationship established, your committee was unable to secure information regarding the Government's program and requirements, for the obvious reason that there was no centralized power from which such comprehensive information could be obtained. In fact, there was no central authority engaged in securing such information or in formulating general plans to meet the rapidly developing industrial problems of the war.

"When, on July 13, your committee stated in a war bulletin that there was need for a central agency to control the procuring of war materials and supplies, to formulate programs, to reach decisions, to stop debate, and to take decisive action, your committee was but making public statement of views held by many officials of the Government and others in intimate contact with the situation.

"On the other hand, it is true that many in the Government departments were fearful that any effort to create a central control would interfere with the immediate activities of the departments and disorganize and interrupt the efforts to meet the requirements of the army which was being formed. The essential difference of view, therefore, was, on the one hand, between expanding what existed with the addition of independent activities, such as the Food and Fuel Administrations, and, on the other hand, creating, through central control and responsibility, an organization designed to meet the emergency.

"Toward the end of July the need of centralized authority and responsibility in connection with the procuring of war supplies and materials was recognized in the appointment of the War Industries Board. Unfortunately, the statutory power and responsibility to make war purchases remained scattered in the various Government departments. This has made it necessary for the War Industries Board, in its efforts to secure coordination to rely only upon the common desire and purpose of all Government officials.

"In a bulletin issued on August 10 your committee pointed out that the War Industries Board had no authority to decide inevitable differences of opinion between independent activities or to formulate policies subordinating one war-time activity to another. Furthermore, the bulletin stated that, not being an official department of the Government engaged in procuring war materials and supplies, the War Industries Board was not in a position to plan and execute board programs to meet the great industrial problems of the war.

"In discussing this difference of opinion with officials of the Government it was evident that there was agreement regarding the purpose to be accomplished, but that the Government officials did not agree with your committee regarding the means of securing centralized responsibility and authority.

"The war convention of American business at Atlantic City, called by the national chamber in September, afforded the opportunity to submit this vital subject to business men from all sections of the country. After exhaustive discussion the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"'Resolved by the representatives of American business met in war convention, That all war buying should be assembled under the control of one board or executive department; and be it further

"'Resolved, That this war-supply board or department should be given full power to procure war supplies to the best advantage to the Government as to price, quality, and delivery and in a way to maintain essential industrial life without disturbing social and economic conditions, including the power to fix prices not only to the Government but to the public on essential products and to distribute output in a manner to promote the national defense and the maintenance of our industrial structure; and be it further

"'Resolved, That Congress be hereby requested to pass such statute as may be necessary to give the President of the United States all power necessary to concentrate in this manner the resources and the industrial energy of our country toward winning the war; and be it further

"'Resolved, That the national chamber do its utmost to make effective the purposes of these resolutions.'

"Toward carrying out the purpose of this resolution, and in the hope that the authorities would initiate the measures advocated, your committee held conferences with the Secretary of War, chairman of the Council of National Defense, early in October. Your committee stated that their intimate knowledge of what had been done by the Government to meet the problems of the war enabled them fully to appreciate the splendid work which had been done, but at the same time this committee could not ignore the fact that differences regarding the fundamental principle of authorized central control had not been overcome. They stated that the concentration of industrial energy and resources toward winning the war could come about only to the extent that the Government afforded the necessary leadership, and that without central control and responsibility for withdrawing from industry materials and labor measured by the vast sum of $19,000,000,000, confusion and possible disaster would result.

"On the 14th day of November, 1917, after months of careful study of the situation, this committee submitted a report which was unanimously adopted by 28 members of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. That report contained in substance the following statements of facts and conclusions:

"1. It is clear that without our efforts and resources the war can not be won.

"2. With the experience of both friend and foe to guide us we continue to rely upon the executive organization inherited from the times of our peaceful isolation, reinforced only by the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the War Trade Board, and the committees and boards formed under the Council of National Defense, the principal one of which is the War Industries Board. There has been created no department of munitions or war supplies, war supply board, or similar agency of whatever name, able to bring about centralized control or cooperation between the various Government activities engaged in procuring war materials and supplies.

"3. We are forced to the conviction that disaster is inevitable unless prompt provision is made to centralize the control of the industrial energy and material resources of the country.

"Much helpful advice is available to Government purchasing officers and effective machinery has been created through the War Industries Board for avoiding competition and conflict between the various departments. There have recently been numerous changes improving the Government's existing organization. The Quartermaster's Department, Ordnance Department, and other divisions of the War Department have had changes made in their internal organizations which have greatly increased their effectiveness. In the War Department a council has been created which should bring about greater coordination in the efforts of this branch of the Government's activities. Messrs. Hoover, Hurley, and Garfield have been asked to sit with the Council of National Defense at certain of its sessions. However, a great independent activity has recently been set up in connection with the Government's administration of the railroads.

"No statutory authority has been asked for the War Industries Board, nor has the Council of National Defense been given, by statute, authority to do more than investigate and report. The numerous scattered and independent activities in connection with the procuring of war supplies and materials have not been brought under one control, nor has any agency been constituted responsible for directing the Government's war-time industrial activities.

"Your committee believes that the failure to be guided by the fundamental principle that centralized responsibility and control is needed for the success of any enterprise will inevitably result in ill-balanced effort. There will be unintentional interference with vitally important programs such as that in connection with shipping; there will be production far beyond our capacity of ocean transportation; our allies will be deprived of supplies which we would desire to give them; effort will be expended in the creation of unneeded new facilities; collateral problems, such as the housing of employees, will be neglected until they seriously interfere with other programs; the distribution of essential materials, such as coal, will not be where most needed in connection with the war; vast quantities of materials and labor will be used in unnecessary activities; and, in general, there will be the atmosphere of confusion which comes from inability to secure prompt decision.

"From the beginning your committee has worked consistently along the line of the experience of other nations now at war and of the business principles of consolidation and responsibility expressed in the resolution adopted at the war convention of American business in Atlantic City that 'all war buying,' in whatever departments, boards, and administrations now located, 'should be assembled under the control of one board or executive department.' Although concerned over the delay in the effective development of such a system, your committee has refrained from presenting further reports on the subject during recent weeks while plans have been under consideration by the departments and the War Industries Board. It has, however, continued to urge the principles for which the chamber has declared. In doing this it does not advocate or oppose any particular plan, being intent only upon the establishment of such machinery as will bring about unquestioned central control and responsibility.

"The new plan for making the War Industries Board a coordinating body having now been announced, your committee feels it essential at this time to recommend to the board of directors publication to our members of a statement which, while reviewing the situation, will make clear the divergence between the views of the committee and the policy of this new plan. It heartily approves the steps taken by the Secretary of War in consolidating the organization of the War Department, increasing the personnel, and improving its efficiency by drawing in business men of experience in organization, but it can not agree with the statement that such reorganization of this department takes the place in any degree of a department of munitions or a board of central control. Similar improvements in other departments, boards, and administrations would but tend to develop a decentralized system of purchasing instead of providing for a centralized system. However efficient the War Department, the Navy Department, the War Industries Board, the Shipping Board, the War Trade Board, the Fuel Administration, the Food Administration, the Railway Administration may become, the need for centralized control is but the more emphasized thereby.

"Equally, the more efficient they become the less the actual authority and control of the War Industries Board and its chairman in centralized purchasing. That body which has served from its inception to the present time as the only centralizing agency that has yet been created to which the committee has looked with hopefulness as the body out of which a centralized control of purchasing for all departments might be evolved in view of the disposition to grant it ever-increasing powers, becomes, under the present theory, not a centralized control but, at least, an efficient clearing house to which department officers with whom will rest the responsibility for production refer their orders before they are placed.

"If a department of munitions, war-industries administrator, or war supply board, with full power over and responsibility for the procurement of munitions and supplies is now established it is still necessary to provide more complete coordination of the various new administrations and agencies of the Government whose separate activities affect the efficient conduct of the war program as a whole. We do not believe it is necessary or advisable, as the situation now exists, to bring the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the Railroad Administration, the War Trade Board, or the Shipping Board under the control of the authority responsible for buying.

"At the same time the work of these agencies involves the maintenance of the financial and economic strength of the country and the effective use of our industrial resources. We therefore believe that there should be created some small board or council with no other duty than to have constant supervision over and general direction of the work of these adminstrations, and such additional agencies of similar character as may be created from time to time. Our view is that such a small council should sit continuously, devoting itself to constructive planning, and settling conflicts which may arise from time to time between these administrations and boards, and adjusting the activities of one agency to another as the war needs of the country may require.

"No one who has been given the opportunity to inquire into the situation can refrain from expression of appreciation of the spirit by which all charged with this great work are animated, or of the splendid accomplishments which may be seen in many directions. Whatever may be the organization or method by which the Government endeavors to meet its great problems, American business may be trusted to give its unfailing support. But men of experience in production and distribution would be failing in their duty if they did not express their conviction, drawn from their experience, that whatever may be the form, the need for centralized control and responsibility is demonstrated by all industrial experience."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Military Affairs Committee was subjected to more or less criticism in some quarters because of the war cabinet bill, to which allusions have been made, which was prepared by and in the committee, as embodying their views as one of the essentials necessary to a successful prosecution of the war. As I understand the pending measure, it does not involve the creation of a war cabinet or council, and yet I believe under its terms the President might have power, if power is needed, to appoint such a cabinet or council. In fact, a war council, I am advised, has been appointed, composed of Hon. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War, Hon. Benedict Crowell, Assistant Secretary of War, members ex-officio; E. R. Stettinius, Second Assistant Secretary of War; Maj. Gen. P. C. March, Acting Chief of Staff; Maj. Gen. H. G. Sharpe, Quartermaster General; Maj. Gen. William Crozier, Chief of Ordnance; Maj. Gen. E. M. Weaver, Chief of Coast Artillery; Maj. Gen. E. H. Crowder, Judge Advocate General; Brig. Gen. Palmer E. Pierce; Mr. Charles Day; Maj. Gen. George R. Goethals, Acting Quartermaster General.

What its powers and duties are I am not at this moment advised, but I am sure it is not exercising as broad functions as the war cabinet bill of the committee had in mind, and that was, under the direction of the President, to plan in advance for all the things necessary to be done in future with reference to the conduct of the war. I will not undertake to discuss it, because its terms or its purposes may be defective, but wherein it is defective it might have been corrected by amendment and discussion. I simply desire to say with reference to it that the committee did not act immediately with reference to that measure. It was suggested by the evident lack of coordination in the department and failure to arrange for the future, whether for 90 days, or 6 months, or a year in advance, as to the necessity for troops here or abroad, and matters of a kindred nature.

The question of a proper body to do this work was discussed in Great Britain and a measure creating a war cabinet finally adopted. That it has proven successful I call the attention of the Senate to "The war cabinet report for 1917," to which I have heretofore referred, and I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a few passages from the chapter of this report on administrative organization.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"The most important constitutional development in the United Kingdom during the last year has been the introduction of the war cabinet system. This change was the direct outcome of the war itself. As the magnitude of the war increased it became evident that the cabinet system of peace days was inadequate to cope with the novel conditions. The enlarged scope of Government activity and the consequent creation of several new departments made a cabinet, consisting of all the departmental ministers, meeting under the chairmanship of the prime minister, far too unwieldy for the practical conduct of the war. It was extremely difficult for so large a body to give that resolute central direction which became more imperative the more the population and resources of the nation had to be organized for a single purpose—the defeat of German militarism. Even the development of a comparatively small war committee did not entirely meet the needs of the case, as the final responsibility rested not with them, but with the cabinet.

"With the change of government, therefore, a new method of governmental organization was introduced. The system of the war cabinet distinguishes between the body which is responsible for the supreme direction of the war and the ministers who have charge of the great administrative departments of state. The general direction of the policy of His Majesty's Government during the war rests with the war cabinet, whose members, with one exception, are relieved of the day-to-day preoccupations of administrative work, and whose time is therefore entirely available for initiating policy and for the work of coordinating the great departments of state. The original members of the war cabinet were: The prime minister, the Right Hon. Earl Curzon, the Right Hon. Viscount Milner, the Right Hon. A. Bonar Law, and the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson. Since then the Right Hon. Sir Edward Carson had been added to the war cabinet and the Right Hon. G. N. Barnes has taken the place of Mr. Henderson. In addition, in June, 1917, the war cabinet invited Gen. Smuts, who had attended the meetings of the imperial war cabinet as the representative of the Government of the Union of South Africa, to attend the meetings of the war cabinet during his stay in the British Isles. The only exception to the principle laid down above, that the members of the war cabinet should be free from administrative duties, was in the case of Dr. Bonar Law, who filled the office of the chancellor as the chief representative of the Government in the House of Commons.

"The method of working the war cabinet is as follows: At each meeting the cabinet begins by hearing reports as to the progress of the war since the preceding day. Unless it wishes to confine its deliberations to general questions of policy, it then proceeds to deal with questions awaiting its decision. As these questions in the vast majority of cases affect one or more of the administrative departments, almost all its meetings are attended by the ministers and their chief departmental officials concerned. The majority of the sessions of the war cabinet consist, therefore, of a series of meetings between members of the war cabinet and those responsible for executive action at which questions of policy concerning those departments are discussed and settled. Questions of overlapping or conflict between departments are determined and the general lines of policy throughout every branch of the administration coordinated so as to form part of a consistent war plan. Ministers have full discretion to bring with them any experts, either from their own departments or from outside, whose advice they consider would be useful. The extent to which this policy of inviting expert assistance is carried may be judged from the fact that from December 9, 1916, to December, 1917, no less than 248 persons other than members of the war cabinet and the secretariat have attended its meetings. These include experts on foreign, dominion, Indian, colonial affairs, finance, man power, labor, munitions and industry, shipping and shipbuilding, agriculture, food control, education, trade, railways, and local government, etc. The secretary of state for foreign affairs, the first sea lord of the admiralty, and the chief of the imperial general staff attend at every meeting to communicate the latest intelligence in regard to the war and to consult with the war cabinet on questions that arise from day to day. Under this system the war cabinet has held more than 300 meetings in the past year. This fact in itself indicates the great change which has taken place in the work of the cabinet."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It will thus be seen that the committee was undertaking to profit by the mistakes of the British Government and to organize a cabinet which would give all its time to the consideration of the same questions in this country which the same body considered in Great Britain and which it was deemed necessary to a successful issue.

Mr. President, my time is up and I regret that I can not discuss more at length the reasons which urge me to support the measures which our committee favor and those which induce me to support the pending measure. I shall, however, give the principle involved in it my cordial support, thus conferring upon the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy the power or authority which he feels is necessary to the successful termination of the war.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know whether the Senator from Idaho was present when the Chair ruled that the discussion now is upon amendments and is limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it has been stated in this debate that if this measure should become a law the President could confer the functions of the Department of Justice upon the postmaster at Washington. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that under the terms of the bill the President could transfer the functions of the Department of Justice to the postmaster at Washington, that is not to my mind a conclusive argument against the bill. If that rule were to be adopted, practically all the measures which we have passed conferring upon the President discretionary powers would need to be recalled, and we would have to adopt an entirely different rule with reference to legislation in the future.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that there is only one rule by which a Senator can be guided in these somewhat doubtful and somewhat unmarked times so far as legislation is concerned, and that is to determine, in the first instance, whether or not the bill is one which Congress has the right under the Constitution to pass, and, secondly, if it is a measure which under the Constitution we have a right to pass, whether or not in his judgment it is necessary or will be helpful in the great enterprise in which we are now engaged.

If he should determine these two propositions in the affirmative, I do not see how he can withhold his vote upon the theory that the powers may be executed incompetently or willfully. The people who are to execute these powers are responsible to the same tribunal to which we are responsible. They have been selected under the machinery of the Government and in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution to perform the functions which pertain to their different offices, and if we conclude that we have the power to pass a law and that the measure is one which could be used effectively to accomplish the thing which we all desire to accomplish, it seems to me we are not in a position to withhold our votes upon the theory that such a thing as transferring the functions of the Department of Justice to an incompetent person might take place. We can not assume that powers needful for the prosecution of the war will be used willfully to retard its prosecution.

Under that rule, Mr President, we have already passed an act known as the corporation finance act, by which the President could bring to utter ruin and disaster any business of the country. We have passed a bill whose wide discretionary powers would enable him to disrupt particular lines of business now actively engaged in any enterprise in this country.

If we were to assume that these powers were to be exercised incompetently or willfully we have already passed measures which would make it utterly impossible for us to accomplish the great object which we are now hoping to accomplish.

I am going to determine, therefore, Mr. President, if I may, whether or not this is a measure which under the Constitution we have the power to pass, and, secondly, whether or not it seems to be one which will be helpful and beneficial in the execution of the enterprise in which we are now engaged.

In the first place, I desire to analyze the bill briefly to see what are its terms. The act is limited to the period of the war. At the end of the war all the different functions of these different departments will be restored to the integrity which they enjoyed prior to the passage of this measure. In other words, it is not within the power of the President to effectuate any permanent changes in our departments or our bureaus. The President can work no permanent changes in the executive or administrative functions of the Government. He can only choose his agencies and transfer the functions of the different departments and bureaus during the time we are actually engaged in the prosecution of the war. After that all powers and functions go back to their accustomed places.

We need have no fear, therefore, of any permanent changes being wrought under this measure, because not only does the measure provide that it is a war measure, but it now specifically provides that at the close of the war these different functions and agencies shall resume the positions and the functions which they now occupy.

We are therefore, Mr. President, doing this and nothing more. We are conferring upon the President the right and the power to choose his agencies among the different agencies and administrative functions of the Government, by which he will execute the functions of the Government during this emergency, and nothing more.

So far as I am concerned, I do not regard that as a particularly strong feature of the bill, but there were those who felt that there ought not to be any power granted which would effectuate a permanent change in our institutions, and that is the way the bill now stands.

The bill deals alone with the subject of the executive agencies of the Government. It does not assume to enter any other field except that of the executive and the administrative functions, and its authorization with reference to these functions or agencies is for the redistribution of those agencies, and that alone.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A redistribution of the power of the agencies.

Mr. BORAH. Very well, a redistribution of the powers of the agencies. The President must find somewhere within the sum total of powers now granted to these different agencies the agency which he is going to use and the functions which he will seek to have in operation by the different departments. He can not add to any department, he can not create anything; he simply must use the agencies which are now in existence somewhere and in some way, if he chooses to do so, in carrying on the war.

Mr. REED. I rose to ask the Senator to yield, but his time is short and I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. BORAH. I am entirely willing to yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. REED. I think it would hardly be fair. When I rose I had forgotten the time limit.

Mr. BORAH. I am perfectly willing to have the Senator ask me a question.

Mr. REED. The Senator has just made a statement that there are no new powers to be exercised, leaving the inference that it is a mere transfer of power from one board or one tribunal to some other board or tribunal; but is it not true that we have created numerous boards, each board to be composed of a certain number of men, and frequently those men possess certain qualifications and in many instances the approval of the Senate is required? Is it not true that all those functions might be transferred to one individual, and is it not a very different thing to lodge the power in a board or tribunal or in a number of boards or tribunals and to concentrate all those powers in the hands of one individual? Now, if the Senator will permit me to illustrate it, the Federal Reserve Board is composed of five members. Certain qualifications are prescribed. Is it not quite a different thing to have a board of that kind with power lodged in it and to have the board wiped out except one man?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the language of the bill is as follows:

> The President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act, and to this end is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary.

I am not interested, because I am not going to argue that feature, as to what the President might in a willful way do. For instance, the President might assign to the most incompetent and most inconsequential and obscure clerk in the State Department the performance of functions which ought to be performed by the Secretary of State himself. The President might select some incompetent and obscure clerk in the Department of Justice and assign to him duties which ought to be performed by competent men who have been confirmed by the Senate. But, Mr. President, what the bill says, and in that light it ought to be construed in all fairness, is that the President is to have the privilege of redistributing the agencies and functions of the different agencies and departments of the Government. He goes into this wide range of bureaus and departments and multitude of functions and selects from them any agency which he sees fit to select to perform a function of some other department, but when the agent is selected, when he is chosen, he must perform that function in accordance with the laws the Congress of the United States has written.

If the President should bestow upon the postmaster at Washington the functions of the Department of Justice, he would have to perform them in accordance with the laws that were upon the statute books of the United States. He can not change the law. He is not permitted to change the law. He may transfer the function from one department to the other, but when transferred it must be performed in accordance with the law which prescribes the functions of the particular department.

So I say, Mr. President, that the only thing we do here or seek to do is to enable the President to choose this or that department, this or that agency, to perform this or that particular duty in this great multitude of agencies and departments with which we have to deal at this time.

I do not find in the bill any language which changes the first section so far as the use of these powers is concerned, and I do not think the measure would bear any other construction than that which has been placed upon it.

As has been said upon the floor of the Senate, there is a vast amount of power which this bill apparently confers upon the President which he already possesses. In my humble opinion, the greater portion of the powers to be exercised under this bill could be exercised now by the President without any authority whatever. There are some things, undoubtedly, which the measure requires authority to do, but in a great measure he is now authorized to perform those functions.

Again, the bill provides:

> That should the President, in redistributing the functions among the executive agencies as provided in this act, conclude that any bureau should be abolished and it or their duties and functions conferred upon some other department or bureau or eliminated entirely, he shall report his conclusions to Congress with such recommendations as he may deem proper.

That is inserted in the bill to enable Congress to pass upon the matter of the elimination of any functions or the abolishment of any bureau and also to draw to the attention of the Commander in Chief, the Executive, the fact that if any of these bureaus are found to be unnecessary or any of the functions unnecessary it shall be reported to Congress, so that Congress may avail itself of any benefit of the experience of these years or of any knowledge that may be derived from the experience which we are to have with reference to this change.

It has been known for years in Washington that our bureaus were duplicating work, that they were duplicating expenditures, and that there was a condition of affairs which needed rehabilitation and reorganization and recoordination—or coordination, rather—because it has never been properly coordinated. During Mr. Taft's administration he called that matter particularly to the attention of the Senate, and in a message which has been read to the Senate pointed out wherein these bureaus and departments have become cumbersome and expensive and unwieldly and ineffective. That was in a time of peace. All the more are they so in a time of war, when more efficiency, more celerity, and more effectiveness is required upon the part of the Government.

So the President is authorized to redistribute these functions in behalf of efficiency and effectiveness, and then we provide in the bill that should it be found that it ought to be permanent, the Congress of the United States is entitled to pass upon it.

I think, Mr. President, that my view of this bill is different from that of some of my colleagues upon this side of the Chamber is due to the fact that I think we have gone far toward transforming this Republic into a bureaucracy. There is scarcely any vital principle of government to-day that the Congress of the United States has not transferred to some commission or to some bureau. The most vital functions connected with government are now in the hands of those who are neither elected nor subject to recall by the people of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor appointed, even.

Mr. BORAH. Nor appointed. If there is any form or conception of government more burdensome upon the people, more extravagant and venal, more wasteful of human energy, and more paralyzing to human initiative than a bureaucracy, God in his infinite mercy has not yet permitted it to curse the human race. Bureaucracy is now the worst form of government of which we know.

And yet this war has revealed to us that we have much bureaucracy. Red tape, overlapping, duplication of effort, duplication of expenditures, lack of initiative, always attendant upon bureaucracy, departmental jealousy, absence of coordination, inefficiency are menacing next to the foreign foe. It is because we have entangled this young giant in the enervating meshes of a thorough, blood-sucking, tax-eating bureaucracy that we now find ourselves embarrassed and impeded in the most stupendous task ever laid upon a great people. This condition is not the growth of a day or of a few years. It is the result of legislative and governmental tendencies of the last quarter of a century.

So I say, Mr. President, that in all probability my view in favor of this bill is due to the fact that I believe there ought to be a complete rehabilitation and a complete readjustment of our departments and our bureaus in behalf of efficiency and for the purpose of getting more effective service out of the Government agencies. We do not give the President power to effectuate this permanently, but we do give him the power to change the functions during the war and then avail ourselves of the benefit of it in case it should be found to be of permanent value.

Mr. President, I was about to take up the other subject—the constitutionality of the bill—but my time is so limited that there is no need of going into it in so brief a time, and I shall discuss that upon another amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, every patriotic American who loves the American Republic, who loves the cause of liberty and democracy and the free pursuit of happiness throughout the world loves to listen to the voice of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] whenever he talks in this Chamber. I wish that every Democrat and every Republican in this Chamber, including myself, were a mere duplication of the Senator from Idaho, who has kept his head level, himself in poise, his soul in loyalty, and his interests undisturbed by war passion.

Mr. President, some time ago there were a lot of gentlemen who wanted "a committee on the conduct of the war." Why did they say they wanted it? They said they wanted it in order to make the executive departments more efficient than they already were. They wanted to take out of the hands of the Chief Executive the executive functions of the Government and place them to a certain extent, if not altogether, in the hands of a congressional committee.

The President of the United States recognizes that everything is not going all right all the time and he comes to Congress and says, "I do not think that a committee on the conduct of the war representing the legislative branch of the Government is exactly the right way to carry on the war, but if you will give me power to put square pegs in square holes and round pegs in round holes and take square pegs out of round holes and round pegs out of square holes, I can improve the efficiency of the various executive bureaus of the Government and decrease its inefficiency." That is all there is to this bill in the ordinary common-sense apprehension of a plain Mississippian, Mr. President.

In so far as an attempt of Congress to carry on a war is concerned, the experience of the Continental Congress in interfering with George Washington and Gen. Greene, the experience of the legislative committees of the two Houses upon the conduct of the war in interfering with Stanton and Welles and Lincoln during the Civil War, and the experience of the various committees of the Confederate Congress in seeking to thwart Jefferson Davis and his generals are sufficient warnings to everybody who has any historical sense. There can be no reason under the sun for an attempt to put the onus and burden of carrying on this war upon a legislative committee except partisan feeling or hatred of the President of the United States or suspicion of him. I challenge anybody to mention any other reason except one of those three.

That every man has a right to suspect the President of the United States goes without saying. That every man has a right to distrust the President of the United States, if he do distrust him, and to express that distrust, goes also without saying, but I happen not to be one of the men

I say to you to-day, following in the footsteps of Washington in the war that gained our nationality; following in the footsteps of Lincoln in the war that gained these reunited States, much more firmly united than they were before; following in the footsteps of all the men who have ever conducted a great war anywhere upon this earth, that the men who talk about divided legislative and executive authority are fools, and the men who talk about not intrusting to somebody somewhere centered and unified and harmonized authority are fools. They can not carry on war. It reminds me of what Teddy Roosevelt said about the Secretary of War or Navy or somebody at the beginning of the Spanish-American War. He said he had a conversation with him one day, and the Secretary said—I believe it was the Secretary of War, though it might have been the Secretary of the Navy—but whatever the Secretary, he said, "I had this thing in beautiful running order, and all at once comes along this damned war and destroys it all." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the sole object of this bill is to harmonize executive action; to unify executive purpose; and the sole way of winning a war is to arm the Executive wi thsufficient power to win it.

The old Romans were fools about a great many things; they were barbarians about some things; but they gave to the world a system of law that controlled it for a thousand years; they gave to it a system of public roads that are an example until to-day. They knew nothing about real democracy, and that is the rock upon which they split; but they did know something about carrying on war. Whatever else they were deficient in, they were not deficient in that. They were the war-making power of the world until Germany arose, dreaming that she should found a new empire as a successor of the old Roman Empire and take over world dominion. The old Romans, under a republic and later, understood this about war, that when you came to the critical point you had to have a dictator. They knew that neither the patricians of the capitol nor the plebeians upon the cross streets of Rome could carry on war. The State legislatures and the Congress of the United States can not carry on war. You have got to give somewhere to somebody—selecting the right man if God, under His grace, gives you sufficient wisdom to select him—the power to do this thing and to take charge of it with responsibility. In the war in France we have selected Pershing. I think he is the right man; I hope he is. If he is not, then the President of the United States, as military dictator during the war, has the power to remove him and to put somebody else in his place.

The real war is being carried on over there in France—not here; not by these talks; not by my voice; not by the voices of any of you. I passed through the Senate day before yesterday and I saw one of the most distinguished Senators in this body speaking to four auditors, and one of those four was so deaf he could not here it thunder. That is a part of your legislative and congressional and senatorial life. What do you think that has to do with winning the war? More men, more guns, more munitions! Still more men, still more guns, still more munitions, sent to France as fast as you can get them there! Thoroughly trained or half trained or quarter trained! Send men there as quickly as you can. That is the war-winning slogan.

You and I are sitting here talking about the provisions of a bill to give the President power to do what? To put a square peg in a square hole and a round peg in a round hole. If he finds out that there is a square peg in a round hole or a round peg in a square hole he wants to dismiss one or both or to exchange them. That is all of this bill. That is absolutely all that is in this bill; that is the common sense of it; that is the Mississippi nigger dialect of it.

Your motive in opposing this bill—each one of you—what is your motive? Have you any which is of national import, of international consequence, of war importance? You know you have not. What is this bill intended to help us do? It is intended to help the Executive to cut red tape in the departments. What do most of you who have been stabbing the Executive under the fifth rib while talking about your loyalty—and I am not speaking to any one of you personally; I am leaving each one of you to designate himself as a man who has been pursuing that sort of avocation, if you choose—what has any man in this body who, while protesting loyalty out loud, has been engaged in putting secretly a dagger under the fifth rib of the Executive; what has been your chief charge? It was that there was "too much red tape." The President comes to you and asks you, "For God's sake let me cut the red tape; let me do away with the little technical requirements that prevent me from putting Jones in Smith's place when Jones can do the work of Smith and Smith can not do it, and I have found out that Smith can not do it, and the only recourse I have is to remove Smith, who might do very well somewhere else, and when I can not even appoint Jones to Smith's place, because of rules and regulations."

Some of you have been here talking a long time—I refer not to any man personally, except the man who rises to confess that he has been—talking about the inefficiency of the executive departments; the inefficiency of all the work that we have been doing; the red tape that keeps us back; the man in the department who, when anybody goes to him and says, "I have got something here that can hurt the enemy; I have something here that can help the American Republic," "passes the buck" to the next fellow; and when you go to him he passes the buck to the yet next fellow. After all that, the President of the United States comes in and says, "I want to stop 'passing the buck'; I want to 'cut the red tape out'; I want to put a square peg in a square hole; I want to put a round peg in a round hole; I want authority to carry on this war efficiently as far as the executive department, constitutionally nominally under my control, is concerned," and you say, "Nay, nay Pauline!"

Go back to history a while and see the crowd of Senators and Representatives that daily, I might say hourly, under the Federal Government criticized Lincoln and Stanton and Welles—Welles, the greatest of them all, so far as mere efficiency went. Go into the history of the country on the other side of the Ohio and the Potomac Rivers and find fellows who were always criticizing Jeff Davis, because Jeff Davis would keep Robert E. Lee and Stonewall Jackson and Albert Sidney Johnston in command of the armies. Why, these wiseacres, in the rear as legislators, without any information, thought that certain distinguished politicians in their respective States ought to have command of the army. Go back and study it all up. Above all things, Mr. President, let Senators study—oh, the almost divine art of "passing the buck." Shipping Board? Yes. Airplane Board? Yes. War Department? Yes. One or another bureau of the department? Yes. "Whom shall I see?" "Smith." Smith passes the buck to Jones, and Jones passes the buck to Williams, and Williams passes the buck to Robinson, and Robinson passes the buck to Knox; and so we go.

The President is asking you to relieve him of the necessity of passing the buck. He is asking you, for God's sake, to give more elasticity of action, harmony of policy, unity of purpose, and make him, so far as the executive departments of this Government are concerned, during the war dictator, if you please—yes; at least military dictator. If you do not give to the Executive sufficient authority whereby at least the executive department of the Government—not the legislative, not the judicial, but at least the executive department of the Government—can be harmonized with itself, can be unified in purpose, can avoid duplication, can avoid "passing the buck," then this war may be won, but it will be won by the grace of God in Europe without our help. It may be won, and it will be won, because God is our chief ally; not the gods of the Vandals and the Goths—Thor and Woden and Frey—not the god of "might is right," but the God in whose opinion always right must in the long run be might, because right will not otherwise have the gentleness and the love and the humane purpose behind it that will make it might in the long run. We may win it, but, so far as we Americans are concerned, we shall have very little to do with it unless we have one captain here, as we have now, thank God, one captain in Europe—Foch.

Mr. President, until we can make at least of the executive departments of the United States Government one function, one purpose, one will, one object, and one love our way is doubtful.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has attempted to draw a lesson from Roman history. Let me go back just a little farther than Roman history, and refer to the laws of Draco, said by his historian to have been written in blood; but, Mr. President, the laws of Draco, severe and drastic though they were, had this virtue, the virtue of certainty, and the citizens of the city—State of Athens—knew by that first-written Athenian Code what the law was, what their rights were under the law, what the penalties were for a violation of the law; and so much did they admire Draco for the promulgation of this written code that it is said they killed him with their kindness, and in their enthusiasm and gratitude by covering him at the theater with their cloaks and their caps, thus suffocating him.

The point I desire to make, Mr. President, has direct reference to the bill we are now considering. It has been said that the most celebrated system of jurisprudence known to the world begins as it ends with a code. How did that first code, the Code of the Twelve Tables, come to be written? Because of the uncertainty of the customary law, if there was such a thing as customary law, because of the demands of the plebeians of Rome that the laws be reduced to writing, in order that every citizen there might know what his rights were under the law and what the penalties were for a violation of the law. Out of a feeling of insecurity, out of a system of arbitrary rule and the exercise of arbitrary power before a written code comes into existence, has grown the demand ever for the written code.

What is the application? It is in the tremendous and sweeping powers conferred by this bill on the Chief Executive of the United States. The bill is certain in one thing only, and that is in the tremendous powers it confers; but it is uncertain altogether as to the extent and manner of the exercise of the powers conferred.

Mr. President, we have heard here from day to day, and we heard it in the discussion before the Judiciary Committee, continued reference to subordinate divisions, bureaus, and branches under the several executive departments of the Government. There was very little discussion, as there has been here on the floor of the Senate, relative to the power conferred upon the President in regard to the executive departments themselves; and his power under the terms of this bill to suspend, in effect, the powers and the functions of the executive departments, and each and every one of them. What are these "functions"? Let me give you the definition of the word "function" as found in the Century Dictionary:

> Function: Power of acting; faculty; that power of acting in a specific way which appertains to a thing by virtue of its special constitution; that mode of action or operation which is proper to any organ, faculty, office, structure, etc.

And this, according to the dictionary, is the most usual signification of the term.

Mr. President, have we considered for any length of time at all here in this discussion the powers and functions of the several executive departments, and in view of what those powers and functions are, have we asked ourselves the question as to whether we want to put it in the power of the Chief Executive to redistribute those powers and functions? Who distributed them in the first place? Redistribution implies a distribution to begin with. Congress distributed them and, in my judgment, Congress is the only power that could create the different executive departments and clothe them with certain powers and functions for the carrying on of the Government's activities.

First, by act of 1789, it is provided that—

> There shall be at the seat of government an executive department to be known as the Department of State, and a Secretary of State, who shall be the head thereof.

Among the powers and functions of that department are those relating to correspondence and negotiations with the public ministers from foreign States or princes, the instructions to ministers or consuls from the United States. The Secretary of State has the custody and charge of the seal of the United States and of the Department of State. He gives notice of the ratification of any amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It is h' duty to lay before Congress annually a statement of all changes in the commercial systems of other nations, whether by treaties, duties, or other regulations as shall have been communicated to the department. The Department of State, under the direction of the Secretary of State, is the means or instrument through which all the business with foreign governments is conducted, and is the great department for the adjustment of our foreign relations, whether they relate to commerce, whether they relate to citizenship in foreign countries, whether they relate to treaties of peace or a state of war. Who wants the President now to have the power to redistribute the powers and functions of the State Department? And yet the bill in terms gives that power.

> There shall be at the seat of government an executive department to be known as the Department of War, and a Secretary, who shall be the head thereof.

So of all the several departments, with changes mutatis mutandis, as we may say, to suit the different departments and according to the proper designation of their heads. It is the function of the Secretary of War to define and prescribe the supplies to be purchased by the Army through the Quartermaster's Department and the duties and powers respecting such purchases, to make regulations for the transportation of supplies to the Army, the garrisons and recruiting places, and for their safekeeping. The transportation of troops and munitions of war is within the province of the Secretary of War; also meteorological observations at military stations, signal stations, lifesaving stations, and all the establishment thereof are within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War. The survey of rivers and harbors, as we all know, is within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War.

The President, however, will have the power under the bill we are now considering to redistribute the functions and powers of the Department of War, and this in time of war. Do we want to write in the Federal statute book a provision that will give him that power? Where is the necessity for it?

I am not discussing, Mr. President, this question from the constitutional standpoint but from the standpoint of the necessity and the policy, the wise, sound policy of a law like this.

> There shall be at the seat of Government an executive department to be known as the Department of the Treasury, and a Secretary of the Treasury shall be the head thereof.

We know in a general way what the tremendous duties and powers of the Secretary of the Treasury are. He prepares plans for the improvement and management of the revenue and for the support of the public credit; he has the superintendence of the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, the issuance of instructions to the several collectors, receivers, depositories, and officers in regard to the receipt of Treasury notes, United States notes, and other securities. Then come within the Treasury Department, as we know, the auditors for the various departments; first, the Auditor for the Treasury Department itself, and then an auditor for each of the other great departments of the Government. Senators here on this floor have criticized the provisions of the law in regard to the auditors holding these great and necessary places of responsibility. All the accounts of the Interior Department, of the Department of Agriculture, and of every other department are audited by the auditors for that department in the Treasury Department. Who would do away with the functions of the Treasury Department or of the several auditors of the Treasury Department, essential as they all are to the supervision of accounts and the management of the fiscal affairs of the Government? Who would do away with that other function or branch of the Treasury Department, the Comptroller of the Currency, who supervises and regulates the issuance of all the currency of the country under Federal law?

Yet we are considering a bill that gives the President power to suspend or redistribute—which, I think, in practical terms are the same thing—all the powers and functions of the Treasury Department.

So I might go through all the departments, Mr. President. I have enumerated only a part of them. But there they are.

The great Department of State was first created by act of Congress at its first session to symbolize and represent the equal sovereignty of this Nation among the other sovereignties of the world, to deal with them and treat with them in regard to our rights, our commerce, our citizens, and in regard to the great issues that make for war or peace. To whom or to what would you distribute these high powers and functions?

The Department of the Treasury has from the beginning been the one great business department of the Government. What would become of our financial resources and of our credit if the function of managing our fiscal affairs were handed over to the War Department in this redistribution or to the Department of the Navy or to the Department of Labor?

Mr. President, the Department of War and the Department of the Navy represent the Nation in arms; they guard, conserve, and marshal the armed forces as the last resort for the protection of our territory, the preservation of our national integrity, the safeguarding of our citizens, the vindication of their rights, and the rights of the Nation. Is it contemplated that that function shall be turned over to some other department, such as the Department of the Interior, for example? Yet on the face of it, Senators, that is the power conferred upon the President, to take the great departments of the Government and redistribute their powers and functions at his will and at his discretion.

Mr. President, reference has been made and was made by the Senator from Mississippi to Washington's views. We read here on the 22d day of every February the Farewell Address of that great statesman and chieftain, and here is one single paragraph from that notable address:

> It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Mr. President, it reminds me of the saying that "all despotism is bad, but the worst is that which works under the machinery of free government."

What I say is wholly impersonal; it is no reflection upon the President, nor do I for a moment mistrust his motives, but there is no necessity for such a grant of power as this bill contains.

So, Mr. President, considering the different aspects of this bill, considering, too, the matters brought forward in argument, I find nothing to justify my vote for the bill; and I may say that I have voted earnestly and enthusiastically for every so-called war measure. I would be willing, if it were necessary in the prosecution of this war, that the President be given the power to undo the work of the last 130 years in creating and in building up these departments. Nay, I would be willing that the President might be made supreme dictator, if I thought it necessary in order to win the war, trusting, Mr. President, for an era of peace, trusting to the sober judgment of our citizenship, trusting to our love of free institutions to bring us back again to real, free, representative government. But without such necessity I can not consent to support the measure in its present form.

Mr. NELSON obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that when the session of the Senate closes this afternoon it take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not now; no.

Mr. SMOOT. That when the Senate recesses——

Mr. OVERMAN. That when the Senate recesses to-day, it recess to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock. In other words, I want a recess instead of an adjournment. I ask unanimous consent that at the close of to-day's proceedings the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Suppose some Senator comes in and moves to adjourn?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will put it the other way, then. I move that not later than 6 o'clock the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow. My purpose is to have a recess taken earlier than that, but not later than 6 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina moves that not later than 6 o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I was interested in the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], describing the dangers of despotism and of a despotic form of government; but I want to point out to him, and I shall point out to him before I get through, that he has voted for and supported in this Chamber far more despotic measures than this bill.

This bill had scarcely been cradled in the Judiciary Committee—and in what I am about to say I do not refer to what occurred in the committee room or to what occurred in this Chamber—before a campaign of Schrecklichkeit—if I may use a German term for it, which is very expressive—was inaugurated against this bill and the great dangers that would befall the Government if such legislation should be enacted. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] gave a very good summary of this bill. It authorizes the President to use all the officials in any of the executive departments or other departments of the Government; it authorizes him to redistribute them and to gather them together and utilize them for the purposes of this war, to carry on the war successfully. There is nothing in the bill that authorizes him to destroy any department of the Government, or to destroy any functions of any department of the Government. He simply has the right to take them from one branch or service of the Government and utilize them in another branch of the Government. That is all the bill is—nothing more.

The assumption that has been made here in the argument that the President would destroy these departments, root them up, destroy their functions, and dismantle the Government is wholly gratuitous. There is no foundation for it; and there is no more foundation for the assumption that if this power is conferred upon the President he will exercise the power despotically for the purpose of destroying or ruining the Government or any department of it.

Look at the powers we have conferred on the President already. Let me call your attention to them.

In the act of June 15, 1917, called the spy law, we gave the President most extraordinary power under the embargo provisions of the law. Let me read them to you:

> Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export from or ship from or take out of the United States to any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation.

There is a power far more drastic than this. This relates simply to utilizing the different officials of the Government. Here was a power under which, if the President saw fit to exercise it, he could make an absolute embargo and stop our entire foreign commerce, if he was such a reprobate as some of the arguments we have heard in this Chamber would indicate that he might be.

Let me call your attention further to another law, the food-control law, and see what extraordinary powers were given to the President in reference to the economic life and entire welfare of the American people. I read from the act commonly called the food-control act of August 10, 1917, and I call the attention of Senators to the powers given to the President in that act:

> SEC. 10. That the President is authorized, from time to time, to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy.

Then, by section 11—

> That the President is authorized, from time to time, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell for cash at reasonable prices—

And so forth. I want to say to the Senator from South Dakota that here far greater powers are conferred upon the President than in this bill, which only relates to the administration of the Government. If these powers were exercised by a despot and in the manner suggested by the Senator from South Dakota in reference to the pending bill, he could wreck and destroy entirely our economic life.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator permit an interruption, since he has referred to my position?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. I did not intend to say nor to intimate for a moment——

Mr. NELSON. The Senator can ask me a question, but my time is short, and I can not yield for more than a question.

Mr. STERLING. I thought that under these circumstances I might be permitted to make a statement. If the Senator objects, however, I will refrain.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator knows I have but a short time. If he wants to ask a question, I will yield.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator that I recognize that, and I do not want to take his time.

Mr. NELSON. Now I read from section 12 of the same act:

That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition—

And so forth. Compare the powers that I have read with the powers given the President in the bill under consideration.

I read from section 13:

That whenever the President finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in, or in order to prevent unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, hereafter in this section called evil practices, he is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing, or may either wholly or partly prohibit, operations, practices, and transactions at, on, in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices.

I read from section 14:

That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit.

He is authorized to fix prices.

The powers which we have given to the President in all these cases are absolute powers, and they pertain to the economic life and well-being of the American people. If the President were likely to prove a despot, if the President were likely to be oblivious of his high duties to this country, here are greater powers, under which he can do far more harm than under this bill.

Section 16 reaches my brethren who are engaged in distilling liquor and making beer:

That the President is authorized and directed to commandeer any or all distilled spirits in bond.

Just think of that! I want to call the attention of my good friend from South Dakota to the great danger that the country might suffer from the President's commandeering the distilled spirits of the country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Dakota for a question?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator think that it would prejudice the people of South Dakota, or that they would object to the exercise of that power right now by the President of the United States?

Mr. NELSON. They might consider it despotic power.

Then I read from the food-production law, section 2:

That the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, is authorized to investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts—

In reference to food, and so forth, and to lay down certain rules. I will not take the time of the Senate to read all of it.

So if we look at these different statutes we have given the President already extraordinary powers, far more than this bill confers, in reference to matters that concern the economic life and the welfare of the American people. Has he exercised those powers improperly? I think not. The only direction in which there has been much criticism has been in respect to one of his subordinates, Mr. Garfield, in reference to the coal situation, but no one, so far as I know, will accuse the President of having exercised all the great powers conferred by this legislation in an undue and injudicious manner to the injury or detriment of the American people.

It seems to me passing strange, after we have given all these powers to the President, that we should haggle about giving the President the power to utilize all the officials in the various departments of the Government, to have them articulate and operate together for the purpose of carrying on the war. That is all there is in this bill, and nothing more. It is an administrative bill. In order to make it a bad bill you have got to assume that the President would have the power under this bill to wreck and destroy the different executive departments; that he would have the power to tear up this Government, root and branch, when, if you take the bill in its entirety, it simply gives the President the power to utilize all the forces in the several departments of the Government.

I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] in the remarks he made the other day, namely, that nearly all the powers that this bill proposes to vest in the President he already has. Let me quote from the RECORD what the Senator from Pennsylvania said:

Mr. KNOX. I think the President of the United States has the authority to require every executive officer and every department of the Government to do anything that he directs to be done in order to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion. I think he has the power to delegate from one Cabinet officer to another the discharge of any particular duty that he thinks such a Cabinet officer can discharge better than the one upon whom it would normally be incumbent. I do certainly think that the President has all those powers.

Again, I quote from him:

Mr. KNOX. I have the very highest respect for those advising the President of the United States; but if that responsibility were cast upon me, as I have read the Overman bill, in so far as it proposes to authorize the President to utilize and coordinate executive activities, so far as I can see what it means from its language and so far as I am informed in this particular by those who are back of the bill, I would not hesitate a second to advise the President of the United States that he now fully possesses that power.

Mr. President, those are my views. But there is another class of men here in the Senate who take a different view of the matter. They insist that this legislation confers upon the President greater and more extraordinary powers than he ever possessed before, and that he possesses hardly any of these powers. Then, Mr. President, the situation is this—and we had a similar situation in the history of this country a few years ago. In 1909, I think, there was a great raid made in California to secure the oil lands of the country under the mining laws of the country. The attention of President Taft was called to the matter by the Interior Department—the fact that there was danger of the Government losing all its oil lands, and that it was necessary for the President to withdraw those oil lands from settlement and location in order to save them for the United States—and he made a withdrawal of those public lands. That withdrawal was questioned; his authority to make it was denied; and so President Taft, recognizing the fact that his authority to make those withdrawals was questioned in some quarters, recommended legislation to meet it.

I read from the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Midwest Oil Co. (236 U. S., p. 482). Here is what the opinion states, referring to the act that we passed conferring upon the President the power of withdrawal:

The legislative history of the statute shows that there was no such intent and no purpose to make the act retroactive or to disaffirm what the agent in charge had already done. The proclamation of September 27, 1909, withdrawing oil lands from private acquisition—was of far-reaching consequence, both to individuals and to the public. It gave rise to much discussion, and the old question as to the authority of the President to make these orders was again raised. Various bills were introduced on the subject, and the President himself sent a message to Congress calling attention to the existence of the doubt and suggesting the desirability of legislation to expressly grant the power and ratify what had been done. A bill passed the House containing such ratification and authorizing future withdrawals. When the bill came to the Senate it was referred to a committee and, as its members did not agree in their view of the law, two reports were made. The majority, after a review of the practice of the department, the acquiescence of Congress in the practice, and the decisions of the courts, reported that the President already had a general power of withdrawal, and recommended the passage of the pending bill, inasmuch as it operated to restrict the greater power already possessed. But having regard to the fact that private persons on withdrawn land had raised a question as to the validity of the order and that such question presented a matter for judicial determination, Congress was studious to avoid doing anything which would affect either the public or private rights. It therefore used language which showed not only that the statute was not intended to be retrospective but was not to be construed either as a recognition, enlargement, or repudiation of rights like those asserted by appellees.

That is the withdrawal to which I referred—

To my mind, the situation that confronts us in reference to this legislation is this: We have on the one side able Senators, like the great Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], holding that the President has practically all these powers, and we have on the other side able Senators, like the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who question his having these powers. Under the circumstances it seems to me that we had better put the question at rest, pass this law, and give the President this power. I am no more afraid of the President misusing this power than I was afraid of his misusing the embargo power or the powers given in respect to the foods in this country and other matters of that kind. We have a right to assume that the President of the United States will do nothing to wreck or destroy this Government of any of its functions.

For these reasons, which I have briefly stated, I can not, for the life of me, see any lurking danger that pertains to this bill.

But it is said—and I understand some of the opponents of this bill now have come to the conclusion—that the only things that ought to be left out are the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission. There are a good many of the branches of the Government that are not in the executive departments, and yet it is absolutely necessary to utilize them and function them in aid of the war. Take the Shipping Board, that has charge of all our shipping construction and has charge of the operation of our ships. Take the Federal Trade Commission, that has a good deal to do with investigating the question of prices, which is committed to the President under the food-control law. That commission can furnish him much valuable data and information on the subject.

With respect to the Interstate Commerce Commission, Mr. President, by our railroad legislation we have conferred power upon the President to regulate and control the railroads. I want to call the attention of the Senate to one provision of the law. I read from the law that we passed at this session of Congress, the railroad law:

> That during the period of Federal control, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires, the President may initiate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

And we provided that the charges, fares, classifications, and so forth, shall not be suspended by the commission pending its final determination.

When you have given the President of the United States this plenary power to initiate and regulate rates, why should he, who is not a railroad man and not an expert in these matters, be debarred from utilizing the Interstate Commerce Commission and the force of that commission?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, does the Senator say he is debarred?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. NELSON. I do not say he is debarred, but I say those who insist on that amendment contend that he is. I refer to those who insist that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be omitted from this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator say that if that amendment is adopted the President will be debarred from consulting the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. NELSON. Well, he could not utilize any of it, if that is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NELSON. The purpose of the amendment is to cut him off from utilizing it in carrying out the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The purpose of the amendment is to preserve the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. NELSON. Let me ask the Senator what there is destructive of the Interstate Commerce Commission in allowing the President to utilize it? Will the Senator tell me where the destruction will be?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will answer the Senator. This bill gives to the President the power to transfer every function of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Director of Railroads, which wipes it out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HARDING. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That action will be taken.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered. All those who favor the motion to take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.] The motion is agreed to, and the Senate stands in recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Thereupon (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to morrow, Thursday, April 25, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 24, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of the ages, our God, Architect of the universe and Father of all souls, take away from us all selfish and petty ambitions, and inspire us with high and holy purposes, that we may serve Thee, in a loving and willing service to our fellow men here, now, and always, in the spirit of Him who gave Himself a supreme sacrifice for the world. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ACCOUNTS AND EXPENDITURES OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to move a change of reference of House resolution 307. This resolution has been referred, we think erroneously, to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department. We believe that it should be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent——

Mr. BELL. I move——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have to move if he can get unanimous consent. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to rerefer House resolution 307 to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object—I see the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] is on his feet, and I will yield to him.

Mr. KEATING. Reserving the right to object, I merely want to say that this resolution has been referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and that committee has devoted two days to hearings on the subject and is prepared to proceed with those hearings. The committee, however, does not desire to take charge of the resolution unless it is satisfactory to the House, and we are perfectly willing to submit the whole question to the House, believing that the Speaker did not make a mistake when he referred the resolution to our committee. Believing that, I will object to the unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado objects, and the gentleman from Georgia moves——

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. Is a motion of this kind in order on Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so—motions to refer bills——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair indulge me just a moment on the question of order, whether a motion to rerefer is in order on Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. If there is any dispute about it, we will take it up in the morning. The Chair wants to preserve Calendar Wednesday just as much as anybody else does.

NATIONAL BANKS.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business to-day is H. R. 11020, to amend certain sections of the national banking act, a bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned on the last Calendar Wednesday there was an amendment pending, which I will ask the Clerk to report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. ALMON: Page 5, line 15, after the word "building," strike out the following: "For its accommodation in the transaction of its business."

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now concluded.

Mr. WALSH. I object to that. It has been three weeks since we considered this measure, and it has passed out of the minds of a great many Members.

Mr. PHELAN. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PHELAN. I withdraw my motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] desire to do about it?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, we discussed this fully. It is not an amendment of any great consequence. The bill was discussed at some length when we had it up on the last Calendar Wednesday, and it is the desire of both the Republican and the Democratic members of the Banking and Currency Committee to dispose of this bill. There are other important bills coming up.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; of course it is the desire of the committee to dispose of all of its bills.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the Committee on Banking and Currency occupy the entire day?

Mr. PHELAN. Undoubtedly we will take the entire day. If anybody wants to talk on this amendment I am certainly willing to grant a reasonable time, but I am afraid of wasting time, that is all.

Mr. WALSH. We are wasting time by taking this day for the Banking and Currency Committee. I will withdraw my point of order.

Mr. PHELAN. I renew my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. And I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. PHELAN. Does anybody desire to debate this?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, it has been three weeks since we considered this measure, and a great many Members were not here when the House adjourned on the last Calendar Wednesday.

We are now asked to vote upon an amendment which is not familiar to a great many Members, and I think it is only fair that the gentleman having this measure in charge should briefly refresh the recollection of Members as to what this amendment is and what it provides. After that is done, let us have a vote on it.

Mr. PHELAN. I shall be glad to do that. Will the gentleman object to unanimous consent that we have 10 minutes on the amendment, and let the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON], who offered the amendment, have five minutes?

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection at all to that, but the House should know what it is asked to vote upon.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON], a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] asks unanimous consent that there be 10 minutes' debate on this section and all amendments, at the end of which time it shall be voted on, and that five minutes of the time be given to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. That would not prohibit the offering of other amendments to this section, would it?

Mr. WALSH. No; but it would stop the debate.

Mr. GARNER. I know it would stop the debate.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Texas an amendment he wants to offer?

Mr. GARNER. No; but I did not want to preclude the opportunity for offering amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that at the end of 10 minutes, if any gentleman has an amendment to offer, he can offer it and have it voted on without debate. Evidently this cuts off any discussion of other amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Speaker, can we have the amendment read?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ALMON: Page 5, line 15, strike out the words "for its accommodation in the transaction of its business."

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I offer that amendment to remove any doubt about what would be a proper construction of this section. It may be a wise provision to limit national banks in erecting buildings not to exceed the amount of the paid-up capital stock. However, I think that a national bank in the construction of a bank building should not be confined to the construction of the building to be used solely for banking purposes. I believe they should be authorized to erect an office building to be used in part for banking purposes and other parts to be used in the ordinary way of an office building.

This bill reads as reported by the committee:

But no such association shall hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage, or the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debts due to it, for a longer period than five years; nor shall any such association hereafter invest in a site and bank building or bank and office building for its accommodation in the transaction of its business, an amount in excess of its paid-in and unimpaired capital stock.

I understand that it is the contention of some members of the Banking and Currency Committee that under that provision in the bill the national banks would be authorized to erect an office building to be used a part for banking purposes and rent the other part. However, there is some doubt, and I see no objection to striking out the words "for its accommodation in the transaction of its business."

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from Alabama offered his amendment I made no objection to it. I think it is clear whether the words are in or out. I originally agreed to accept the amendment, but some of the committee members thought it was clearer with the words in than with them out, and so I had to withdraw my acceptance of the amendment. I think it is clear and that there is no need of the words going out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the agreement and understanding with the ranking Republican member of the committee I now move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the title be amended to conform with the text.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the title be amended in accordance with the amendment, which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in the title the words "fifty-two hundred" and the words "and fifty-two hundred and thirty-nine" and insert after the words "fifty-two hundred and twenty-two" the word "and."

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3476) to authorize the extension of a spur track or siding from the existing lines of railroad in the District of Columbia across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the buildings occupied by the field medical supply depot of the Army.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on April 23, 1918, they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 10783. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to increase the facilities for the proof and test of ordnance material, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3476. An act to authorize the extension of a spur track or siding from the existing lines of railroad in the District of Columbia across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the buildings occupied by the field medical supply depot of the Army.

AUTHORIZING NATIONAL BANKS TO CONTRIBUTE TO THE RED CROSS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 9457, authorizing national banks to make contributions to the American National Red Cross.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That during the continuance of the state of war now existing it shall be lawful for any national banking association to contribute to the American National Red Cross, out of any net profits otherwise available under law for the declaration of dividends, such sum or sums as the directors of said association shall deem expedient. Each association shall report to the Comptroller of the Currency within 10 days after the making of any such contribution the amount of such contribution and the amount of net earnings in excess of such contribution. Such report shall be attested by the president or cashier of the association in like manner as the report of the declaration of any dividend.

SEC. 2. That all sums so contributed shall be utilized by the American National Red Cross in furnishing volunteer aid to the sick and wounded of the combatant armies, the voluntary relief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and the relief and mitigation of the suffering caused by the war to the people of the United States and their allied nations.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present. This is a very important measure and ought to have the earnest consideration of every Member of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that no quorum is present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Doorkeeper was ordered to close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms to notify the absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Austin	Flynn	Kennedy, R. I.	Sanders, N. Y.
Barnhart	Fordney	Kettner	Saunders, Va.
Beshlin	Foster	King	Scott, Iowa

Edmonds	Kearns	Rowland	Wright
Estopinal	Kelley, Mich.	Rucker
Fairchild, G. W.	Kennedy, Iowa	Sanders, La.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there will probably be a very long discussion on the bill I have just called up, I desire to withdraw it, and will call up the bill H. R. 11283.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, what is to become of the bill that the gentleman is going to withdraw? I want to know whether it is going off the calendar or will be called up later in the afternoon?

The SPEAKER. It does not go off the calendar. It remains on the calendar.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I want an understanding that it is not going to be called up at some time during the day after everybody goes away from here.

The SPEAKER. The trouble about that is that the gentleman has the right to withdraw the bill without asking the consent of anyone up to the time that it is voted on.

Mr. MADDEN. It is only fair——

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall answer the gentleman, and to satisfy the gentleman's mind I will say that I shall not call up the bill to-day without giving full notice to that side of the House; and at the present time, unless the committee desires otherwise, my opinion is that I shall not call it up. I shall act, however, in accordance with what the committee desires, but I shall not do anything without notifying that side of the House.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, there are many on this side who are strongly in favor of the passage of this bill and who want to see it pass. I have not any knowledge how many there are, or how many there are against it, but I know that I have heard in the last 15 minutes a large number of men on this side say that they are disappointed at its being withdrawn.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, it is a bill providing that somebody may take my money and some other person's money and give it to somebody else.

AMENDING CERTAIN SECTIONS OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT AND REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. PHELAN. The committee desires to get something disposed of to-day, and I think the disposition of the committee will be not to call up that bill. If that is their disposition, I shall not do it. I now call up the bill H. R. 11283, to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be amended and reenacted by striking out that part of such section which reads as follows:

"Directors of class A and class B shall be chosen in the following manner:

"The chairman of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the bank is situated or, pending the appointment of such chairman, the organization committee shall classify the member banks of the district into three general groups or divisions. Each group shall contain as nearly as may be one-third of the aggregate number of the member banks of the district, and shall consist, as nearly as may be, of banks of similar capitalization. The groups shall be designated by number by the chairman.

"At a regularly called meeting of the board of directors of each member bank in the district it shall elect by ballot a district reserve elector and shall certify his name to the chairman of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank of the district. The chairman shall make lists of the district reserve electors thus named by banks in each of the aforesaid three groups and shall transmit one list to each elector in each group.

"Each member bank shall be permitted to nominate to the chairman one candidate for director of class A and one candidate for director of class B. The candidates so nominated shall be listed by the chairman, indicating by whom nominated, and a copy of said list shall, within 15 days after its completion, be furnished by the chairman to each elector.

"Every director shall, within 15 days after the receipt of the said list, certify to the chairman his first, second, and other choices of a director of class A and class B, respectively, upon a preferential ballot, on a form furnished by the chairman of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank of the district. Each elector shall make a cross opposite the name of the first, second, and other choices for a director of class A and for a director of class B, but shall not vote more than one choice for any one candidate," and by substituting therefor the following:

"Directors of class A and class B shall be chosen in the following manner:

"The Federal Reserve Board shall classify the member banks of the district into three general groups or divisions, designating each group by number. Each group shall consist as nearly as may be of banks of similar capitalization. Each member bank shall be permitted to nominate to the chairman of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank of the district one candidate for director of class A and one candidate for director of class B. The candidates so nominated shall be listed by the chairman, indicating by whom nominated, and a copy of said list shall, within 15 days after its completion, be furnished by the chairman to each member bank. Each member bank by a resolution of the board or by an amendment to its by-laws shall authorize its president, cashier, or some other officer to cast the vote of the member bank in the elections of class A and class B directors.

"Within 15 days after receipt of the list of candidates the duly authorized officer of a member bank shall certify to the chairman his first, second, and other choices for director of Class A and Class B, respectively, upon a preferential ballot upon a form furnished by the chairman of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank of the district. Each such officer shall make a cross opposite the name of the first, second, and other choices for a director of Class A, and for a director of Class B, but shall not vote more than one choice for any one candidate." No officer or director of a member bank shall be eligible to serve as a Class A director unless nominated and elected by banks which are members of the same group as the member bank of which he is an officer or director.

Any person who is an officer or director of more than one member bank shall not be eligible for nomination as a Class A director except by banks in the same group as the bank having the largest aggregate resources of any of those of which such person is an officer or director.

SEC. 2. That section 11 (k) of the Federal reserve act be amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"(k) To grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of State or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, registrar of stocks and bonds, guardian of estates, assignee, receiver, committee of estates of lunatics, or in any other fiduciary capacity in which State banks, trust companies, or other corporations which come into competition with national banks are permitted to act under the laws of the State in which the national bank is located.

"Whenever the laws of such State authorize or permit the exercise of any or all of the foregoing powers by State banks, trust companies, or other corporations which compete with national banks the granting to and the exercise of such powers by national banks shall not be deemed to be in contravention of State or local law within the meaning of this act.

"National banks exercising any or all of the powers enumerated in this subsection shall segregate all assets held in any fiduciary capacity from the general assets of the bank and shall keep a separate set of books and records showing in proper detail all transactions engaged in under authority of this subsection. Such books and records shall be open to inspection by the State authorities to the same extent as the books and records of corporations organized under State law which exercise fiduciary powers, but nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the State authorities to examine the books, records, and assets of the national bank which are not held in trust under authority of this subsection.

"No national bank shall receive in its trust department deposits of current funds subject to check or the deposit of checks, drafts, bills of exchange, or other items for collection or exchange purposes. Funds deposited or held in trust by the bank awaiting investment shall be carried in a separate account and shall not be used by the bank in the conduct of its business unless it shall first set aside in the trust department United States bonds or other securities approved by the Federal Reserve Board.

"In the event of the failure of such bank the owners of the funds held in trust for investment shall have a lien on the bonds or other securities so set apart in addition to their claim against the estate of the bank.

"Whenever the laws of a State require corporations acting in a fiduciary capacity, to deposit securities with the State authorities for the protection of private or court trusts, national banks so acting shall be required to make similar deposits and securities so deposited shall be held for the protection of private or court trusts, as provided by the State law.

"National banks in such cases shall not be required to execute the bond usually required of individuals if State corporations under similar circumstances are exempt from this requirement.

"National banks shall have power to execute such bond when so required by the laws of the State.

"In any case in which the laws of a State require that a corporation acting as trustee, executor, administrator, or in any capacity specified in this section, shall take an oath or make an affidavit, the president, vice president, cashier, or trust officer of such national bank may take the necessary oath or execute the necessary affidavit.

"It shall be unlawful for any national banking association to lend any officer, director, or employee any funds held in trust under the powers conferred by this section. Any officer, director, or employee making such loan, or to whom such loan is made, may be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or may be both fined and imprisoned, in the discretion of the court.

"In passing upon applications for permission to exercise the powers enumerated in this subsection the Federal Reserve Board may take into consideration the amount of capital and surplus of the applying bank, whether or not such capital and surplus is sufficient under the circumstances of the case, the needs of the community to be served, and any other facts and circumstances that seem to it proper, and may grant or refuse the application accordingly: Provided, That no permit shall be issued to any national banking association having a capital and surplus less than the capital and surplus required by State law of State banks, trust companies, and corporations exercising such powers."

SEC. 3. That the ninth paragraph of section 16 of the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts approved September 7, 1916, and June 21, 1917, be further amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"In order to furnish suitable notes for circulation as Federal reserve notes, the Comptroller of the Currency shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, cause plates and dies to be engraved in the best manner to guard against counterfeits and fraudulent alterations, and shall have printed therefrom and numbered such quantities of such notes of the denominations of $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, $1,000, $5,000, $10,000 as may be required to supply the Federal reserve banks. Such notes shall be in form and tenor as directed by the Secretary of the Treasury under the provisions of this act and shall bear the distinctive numbers of the several Federal reserve banks through which they are issued."

SEC. 4. That paragraphs (b) and (c) of section 19 of the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts approved August 15, 1914, and June 21, 1917, be further amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"(b) If in a reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district an actual net balance equal to not less than 10 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 3 per cent of its time deposits: Provided, however, That if located in the outlying districts of a reserve city or in territory added to such a city by the extension of its corporate charter, it may, upon the affirmative vote of five members of the Federal Reserve Board, hold and maintain the reserve balances specified in paragraph (a) hereof.

"(c) If in a central reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district an actual net balance equal to not less than 13 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 3 per cent of its time deposits: Provided, however, That if located in the outlying districts of a central reserve city or in territory added to such city by the extension of its corporate charter, it may, upon the affirmative vote of five members of the Federal Reserve Board, hold and maintain the reserve balances specified in paragraphs (a) or (b) thereof."

SEC. 5. That section 22 of the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act of June 21, 1917, be further amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"(a) No member bank and no officer, director, or employee thereof shall hereafter make any loan or grant any gratuity to any bank examiner. Any bank officer, director, or employee violating this provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not exceeding one year or fined not more than $5,000, or both; and may be fined a further sum equal to the money so loaned or gratuity given.

"Any examiner accepting a loan or gratuity from any bank examined by him or from an officer, director, or employee thereof shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned one year or fined not more than $5,000, or both, and may be fined a further sum equal to the money so loaned or gratuity given, and shall forever thereafter be disqualified from holding office as a national bank examiner.

"(b) No national bank examiner shall perform any other service for compensation while holding such office for any bank or officer, director, or employee thereof.

"No examiner, public or private, shall disclose the names of borrowers or the collateral for loans of a member bank to other than the proper officers of such bank without first having obtained the express permission in writing from the Comptroller of the Currency, or from the board of directors of such bank, except when ordered to do so by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by direction of the Congress of the United States, or of either House thereof, or any committee of Congress, or of either House duly authorized. Any bank examiner violating the provisions of this subsection shall be imprisoned not more than one year or fined not more than $5,000, or both.

"(c) Except as herein provided, any officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank who stipulates for or receives or consents or agrees to receive any fee, commission, gift, or thing of value from any person, firm, or corporation, for procuring or endeavoring to procure for such person, firm, or corporation, or for any other person, firm, or corporation, any loan from or the purchase or discount of any paper, note, draft, check, or bill of exchange by such member bank shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be imprisoned not more than one year or fined not more than $5,000, or both.

"(d) Any member bank may contract for, or purchase from, any of its directors or from any firm of which any of its directors is a member, any securities or other property, when (and not otherwise) such purchase is made in the regular course of business upon terms not less favorable to the bank than those offered to others, or when such purchase is authorized by a majority of the board of directors not interested in the sale of such securities or property, such authority to be evidenced by the affirmative vote or written assent of such directors: Provided, however, That when any director, or firm of which any director is a member, acting for or on behalf of others, sells securities or other property to a member bank, the Federal Reserve Board by regulation may, in any or all cases, require a full disclosure to be made, on forms to be prescribed by it, of all commissions or other considerations received, and whenever such director or firm, acting in his or its own behalf, sells securities or other property to the bank the Federal Reserve Board, by regulation, may require a full disclosure of all profit realized from such sale.

"Any member bank may sell securities or other property to any of its directors, or to a firm of which any of its directors is a member, in the regular course of business on terms not more favorable to such director or firm than those offered to others, or when such sale is authorized by a majority of the board of directors of a member bank to be evidenced by their affirmative vote or written assent: Provided, however, That nothing in this subsection contained shall be construed as authorizing member banks to purchase or sell securities or other property which such banks are not otherwise authorized by law to purchase or sell.

"(e) No member bank shall pay to any director, officer, attorney, or employee a greater rate of interest on the deposit of such director, officer, attorney, or employee than that paid to other depositors on similar deposits with such member bank.

"(f) If the directors or officers of any member bank shall knowingly violate or permit any of the agents, officers, or directors of any member bank to violate any of the provisions of this section or regulations of the board made under authority thereof, every director and officer participating in or assenting to such violation shall be held liable in his personal and individual capacity for all damages which the member bank, its shareholders, or any other persons shall have sustained in consequence of such violation."

SEC. 7. That section 5208 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of July 12, 1882, and section 5209 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the acts of April 6, 1869, and July 8, 1870, be, and the same are hereby, amended and reenacted to read as follows:

"SEC. 5208. It shall be unlawful for any officer, director, agent, or employee of any Federal reserve bank, or of any member bank as defined in the act of December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, to certify any check drawn upon such Federal reserve bank or member bank unless the person, firm, or corporation drawing the check has on deposit with such Federal reserve bank or member bank, at the time such check is certified, an amount of money not less than the amount specified in such check. Any check so certified by a duly authorized officer, director, agent, or employee shall be a good and valid obligation against such Federal reserve bank or member bank; but the act of any officer, director, agent, or employee of any such Federal reserve bank or member bank in violation of this section shall, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, subject such Federal reserve bank to the penalties imposed by section 11, subsection (h), of the Federal reserve act, and shall subject such member bank if a national bank to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller of the Currency provided for in section 5234, Revised Statutes, and shall, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, subject any other member bank to the penalties imposed by section 9 of said Federal reserve act for the violation of any of the provisions of said act. Any officer, director, agent, or employee of any Federal reserve bank or member bank who shall willfully violate the provisions of this section, or who shall resort to any device, or receive any fictitious obligation, directly or collaterally, in order to evade the provisions thereof, or who shall certify a check before the amount thereof shall have been regularly entered to the credit of the drawer upon the books of the bank, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, on conviction thereof in any district court of the United States, be fined not more than $5,000, or shall be imprisoned for not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 5209. Any officer, director, agent, or employee of any Federal reserve bank, or of any member bank as defined in the act of December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of such Federal reserve bank or member bank, or who, without authority from the directors of such Federal reserve bank or member bank, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of such Federal reserve bank or member bank, or who, without such authority, issues or puts forth any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, assigns any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment, or decree, or who makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of such Federal reserve bank or member bank, with intent in any case to injure or defraud such Federal reserve bank or member bank, or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of such Federal reserve bank or member bank, or the Comptroller of the Currency, or any agent or examiner appointed to examine the affairs of such Federal reserve bank or member bank, or the Federal Reserve Board; and every receiver of a national banking association who, with like intent to defraud or injure, embezzles, abstracts, purloins, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or assets of his trust, and every person who, with like intent, aids or abets any officer, director, agent, employee, or receiver in any violation of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any district court of the United States shall be fined not more than $5,000 or shall be imprisoned for not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"Any Federal reserve agent, or any agent or employee of such Federal reserve agent, or of the Federal Reserve Board, who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any moneys, funds, or securities intrusted to his care, or without complying with or in violation of the provisions of the Federal reserve act, issues or puts in circulation any Federal reserve notes shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in any district court of the United States shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill amends certain provisions of the Federal reserve act, and two provisions of the Revised Statutes relating to national banks. The first section of the bill provides for some changes in the method of election of class A and class B directors of the Federal reserve banks. The first change takes certain words out of the Federal reserve act. Under the Federal reserve act the Federal Reserve Board is obliged in grouping banks whereby directors may be elected to make the banks as nearly as possible of the same capitalization and also to make the number of banks in each group as nearly as possible equal. This amendment removes the provision relative to making them as nearly as possible of the same number. The purpose is this: The principle in the Federal reserve act in the election of directors is that the three classes of banks—the large, the medium sized, and the small—shall each have representation upon the Federal Reserve Board. Where it is necessary to make the capitalization as nearly as possible equal, and at the same time the number, it has been found impossible to put the same number of large banks in a group as the number of medium sized and small, because there are fewer large banks. As a result, the present law makes it difficult if not impossible to do what was actually intended. This provision leaves it to the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board as to the number which shall go in each group, leaving in the law, however, the provision that the banks in each group shall be as nearly as possible of the same capitalization. In other words, it enables the board to carry out the plain intent of the original Federal reserve act.

The second change in the first section provides for a different method of electing these directors. Under the present law every member bank chooses an elector, and that elector in common with other electors chooses the directors of class A and class B of the Federal reserve banks. This difficulty has arisen:

Because of the failure of the banks to hold meetings and elect reserve electors and for other reasons, a very small proportion of the banks in some districts is taking any part at all in the election of the Federal reserve bank directors. We have recommended a change be made so that the president or the cashier or some other officer of the bank may, by proper action of the bank, cast its vote in the election of Federal reserve bank directors so that the banks may vote much more easily, and in that way participate to a greater extent in the naming of the directors. In addition to that, in the first section we have added some words to the present law which will be found on page 4, line 10, down to line 19, inclusive, as follows:

No officer or director of a member bank shall be eligible to serve as a class A director unless nominated and elected by banks which are members of the same group as the member bank of which he is an officer or director.

Any person who is an officer or director of more than one member bank shall not be eligible for nomination as a class A director except by banks in the same group as the bank having the largest aggregate resources of any of those of which such person is an officer or director.

These provisions are added also to carry out the original intention of the Federal reserve act. Under the first paragraph I read this will be required hereafter, that if the small banks select a director they must select him, if he is a director of any bank, from a directorate of some one of that group. In other words, the small banks will not be permitted to select as their representative a man who is a director in one of the large banks. The second paragraph I read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. In a moment. The second paragraph makes this further provision, that if a man is a director in what might be termed a large bank, he can not be elected a Federal reserve bank director except to represent the group of large banks. In other words, if a man is a director in banks coming within the three groups or within two groups, he can represent only that group in which the bank of largest or larger capitalization happens to come. The purpose is this: We find in some of the Federal reserve bank districts that two or sometimes, I think, even three of the Federal reserve directors in class A are men who are the big bankers, men who are directors in banks of the groups of largest capitalization, but because they also happen to be directors of small banks, are then elected to represent the smaller group. Although it is not entirely pertinent at this point, I might add that in some cases the smaller banks can dominate to the exclusion of the large banks. The intention of the Federal reserve act was that there should be representation for all kinds of banks; that the larger banks should have Federal reserve directors fitted to represent them, the medium-sized banks directors to represent them, and the small banks directors to represent them, but the provisions were not secure enough to prevent what has actually happened, and it is the purpose of the committee in offering this amendment to make provision by law whereby the plain intent of the Federal reserve act shall be carried out.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I will now yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. My memory may not serve me correctly, but I was under the impression that the Federal reserve act in the selection of the respective groups of directors from the respective classes of banks, that the group of banks would have the authority to select any person of their own group whom they choose to represent them, and that they could by that means elect a member who was perhaps a member also of another class, though their vote would determine who should be their representative. Am I in error as to my recollection of the law?

Mr. PHELAN. If I understood the gentleman, he stated the situation exactly as it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the fact, why should not the banks of a certain class have the privilege of selecting a director, even though that director might be a representative of one of another class of banks? Why should not the smaller banks be privileged to select the man they choose, even though perchance he may be a director in some other class of banks?

Mr. PHELAN. Well, for two reasons. The first is that it is difficult, under some conditions, to get the banks to participate as freely as they should, and a few banks can control the whole situation. In the second place, some men, because of their power and the fact that they are directors of those big banks and of smaller banks—a chain of banks—may be able to exercise such power as to get the positions. Men do not truly and genuinely represent that class of banks when the banks, if they had those influences removed, would not select that kind of men to represent them. We feel that the smaller banks ought to have representatives who will represent them for their interest, and not for other interests interfering with that representation. For that reason we have purposely made it impossible to have the present practice continued.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. PHELAN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I understand now that the small bank has just as many votes as the large bank under the law. Is that right?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; except the banks are grouped, the gentleman will understand. There will be one group of large banks, another group of small banks, another group of medium-sized banks, and each group elects one director of class A and one director of class B.

Mr. CANNON. That is the law now?

Mr. PHELAN. That is the present law; yes.

Mr. CANNON. That is to say, if one man has $10,000,000 and is a candidate, and another has $100,000 and is a candidate, the $100,000 man can not vote for the $10,000,000 man or against him. Is that it?

Mr. PHELAN. Under the present law he can vote for the man who is to represent the large bank. Under the present law the smaller group can take the $10,000,000 man if they want to, but they can not vote for him in common with the larger bank. They are put in a separate class, and the votes do not come together under the present law.

Mr. CANNON. That is to say, the small banks can not vote for the directors of the large banks?

Mr. PHELAN. Well, under the present law——

Mr. CANNON. I mean under the present law.

Mr. PHELAN. They can not select——

Mr. CANNON. In other words, they are put in three groups—one small, one medium class, and one large?

Mr. PHELAN. These groups exist to-day, and the only difference is this: The groups are just the same. We have one group of large banks, one group of medium-sized banks, and one group of small banks. Now, the directors in the first group elect a man of class A. The directors of the second group elect a man of class A, and the third group in similar manner. Under the present law the directors, or rather the electors, of the group of small banks can elect a man who is a director in a large bank if they see fit to do so. Under the law as we have arranged it here, if this amendment goes through Congress, a man who is a director of a large bank can not represent these smaller banks.

Mr. SNYDER. Is not this what the gentleman means? Under the law to-day all three groups can elect one man to represent them in all three groups. In other words, a director who is elected, who represents a large bank, can also be elected to represent a medium-sized bank?

Mr. PHELAN. Not the same man. But take the case of the Federal reserve bank in Chicago. My recollection is that two of your directors out there are directors in perhaps the largest banks in the city of Chicago.

Mr. CANNON. One the First National and the other the Commercial.

Mr. PHELAN. One of those men is elected under the present law to represent the large banks and the other man is elected to represent either the medium size or the small banks—I do not know which—but these men are both directors of large banks. What we desire to do is to have men on the boards of these Federal reserve banks who are truly representative of the smaller banks, just as others should be representative of medium-sized and large banks. That is the purpose of the amendment. That section gave national banks the power to act——

Mr. STAFFORD. Before you leave section 1 may I direct the chairman's attention to a typographical error in the quotation marks following the word "candidate," in line 10, page 4?

Mr. PHELAN. What is the error?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think there should be any quotation marks there. They should be before the word "Any" in line 15. You are amending the law.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, there was a mistake in the paragraphing. The word "No," on page 4, line 10, starts the new matter. That should have been made a separate paragraph there. The present law ends with the word "candidate."

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the new paragraph it is not printed as such, and we are considering the bill as printed. Therefore, I suggest to the gentleman that the quotation marks should be eliminated there and placed before the word "Any," and also following the word "director" in line 19.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that change be made, namely, that the quotation marks in the middle of line 10, page 4, after the word "candidate," be stricken out and quotation marks be put after the word "director," on line 14, and before the word "Any," on line 15, and after the word "director," in line 19.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is in error in placing quotation marks after the word "director," in line 14. That would only come after the section.

Mr. PHELAN. I see. Strike out the quotation marks after the word "candidate," on line 10 of page 4, and insert quotation marks after the word "director," on line 19, on the same page, and before the word "Any," in line 15.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the change which the gentleman asks unanimous consent to have made.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PHELAN moves to amend, on page 4, line 10, by striking out the quotation marks after the word "candidate"; insert quotation marks before the word "Any," in line 15; and insert quotation marks after the word "director," in line 19.

The SPEAKER. While the amendment stage has not been reached, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] asks unanimous consent to make the changes indicated by the Clerk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. I was going to ask the gentleman, as to the quotation marks, if he pointed out that, on page 3, line 10, the Federal Reserve Board is put in as classifying these banks, whereas under the present law the directors of the Federal banks will do it.

Mr. PHELAN. I will say to the gentleman that if he notices any typographical change that ought to be made he can take it up later.

Mr. PLATT. It is a change in the present law.

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will keep it in mind, he can take it up a little later.

Section 2 refers to section 11 (k) of the Federal reserve act. Under that section certain fiduciary powers may be granted to the national banks of the country. The amendment we offer extends those powers so as to include other fiduciary powers, ordinarily exercised by State banks. You will find those additions on page 4:

Registrar of stocks and bonds, guardian of estates, assignee, receiver, committee of estates of lunatics, or in any other fiduciary capacity—

And so no. Those words have been added so as to give national banks under the restrictions of the bill the power to exercise similar fiduciary capacities to those exercised by State banks.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice in lines 10 and 11, page 5, beginning in line 9, this language:

The granting to and the exercise of such powers by national banks shall not be deemed to be in contravention of State or local law within the meaning of this act.

What is meant by "within the meaning of this act"?

Mr. PHELAN. I was just going to take that up.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Those words, "shall not be deemed to be in contravention of State or local law within the meaning of this act," are rather vague.

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman has just referred to another change of considerable importance in the present law. The United States Supreme Court has already interpreted the present law, and it has held this—if I may be excused for attempting to paraphrase, with a full knowledge of the danger of paraphrasing—it has held this, in effect: That the Federal Reserve Board, under powers conferred in section 11 (k), may grant these fiduciary powers to national banks where the States permit that to be done, and also that the Federal Reserve Board may grant these fiduciary powers to national banks where the States do not give any such authority to national banks, but do give it to State banks, but do not prohibit national banks from receiving such authority.

Now, we have gone a step further and, acting in full accord with what the decision of the Supreme Court says we can do, have added this further provision, to the effect that the Federal Reserve Board shall have the power under the limitations of the act to grant these fiduciary powers to national banks, even though in the State law there is expressly or by implication some prohibition to the granting of this power to national banks, with, however, this provision: That that shall apply only where a similar power is granted to State banks, trust companies, or other competing corporations.

In other words, we have endeavored by this amendment to make provision whereby national banks shall be put upon precisely the same footing with reference to these fiduciary powers, so far as that can be done by our law, with State banks, trust companies, and other competing corporations.

Mr. ROBBINS. Before you leave that section, may I ask if it is your intention here to enlarge the rights of national banks so as to be equal with the powers now conferred on trust companies by the laws of the various States creating them?

Mr. PHELAN. I will not say that. I will say that where we are granting these fiduciary powers we intend that the national bank shall have the right to exercise those powers if the Federal Reserve Board desires to grant it wherever the State grants similar powers to State banks, trust companies, and competing corporations.

That is somewhat different from the case as the gentleman states it. Let me give you a case that you will understand: In the State of New York there is a statute which prohibits the exercise of fiduciary powers except by trust companies organized under the provisions of the same statute. In all probability under that New York State law the Federal Reserve Board, under the act as it stands, could not grant a similar power to a national bank in New York State, because in New York State the State law prohibits the exercise of these powers except to those trust companies. We intend to give the Federal Reserve Board the power to enable the national banks in New York State to exercise these powers as they are exercised by trust companies in New York State.

Mr. ROBBINS. I see, Mr. Speaker; but in the State of Pennsylvania we have four kinds of banks—national banks, trust companies, State banks, and private banks. All these banks are subject to examination, three by the examiners of the State of Pennsylvania and national banks by the Federal agents. Under that system of law we have established in the State of Pennsylvania a well-established system of trust companies transacting fiduciary obligations and discharging trust relations. Now, you propose here to permit the national bank to invade that field, either for the purpose of establishing a new field of banking for the national bank or to force the trust companies into the Federal Reserve System. What is your purpose, and what is your reason for granting this new power to national banks?

Mr. PHELAN. There may be a number of reasons, but I will state the principal reason. We intend, so far as we can by national law, not to permit the State to grant powers in discrimination against national banks. We intend that national banks shall not be discriminated against when it is unnecessary, and it is in order to prevent that discrimination that we are recommending this amendment to the present law.

Mr. ROBBINS. There is no complaint from the national banks in our Commonwealth about that situation. Here you propose now to permit the national banks to invade a field that the trust companies have developed and that they occupy and in which they discharge these fiduciary obligations to the entire satisfaction of the people. I think that is unfair. I think it is uncalled for. I think there is no necessity for it.

Mr. PHELAN. I have been informed that in many parts of the United States the trust companies themselves not only are willing that national banks shall have these powers, but are rather desirous that they should have them on this ground, that they depart from the narrow ground of selfish interest, so far as their own competition with national banks is concerned, and take this position, that they believe fiduciary powers should be exercised by certain corporate entities.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. They think trust powers in certain cases can be better executed by them than by individuals, and they regard it as better to extend this power so that any organization like a national bank, which can exercise these powers to the benefit of the community, shall be included. In other words, they are putting it on a broad ground, and in many cases they favor this proposition.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not wish to provoke discussion unnecessarily with the gentleman at this time, but let me suggest this: The trust companies in the States are creatures of the States. The national banks are not. The trust companies of the States are subject to the examination of the courts of the States. The national banks are not; and the effect of this provision of this bill, if approved, will be to drive the trust companies out of business.

Mr. PHELAN. Excuse me right there; we went all over that ground. I am perfectly willing to yield all the time necessary, but I do not want to use all the time myself. We went all over that question ourselves with the greatest care. Those suggestions came up in the committee room. I will call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that the probate court judge or other judge having jurisdiction is supreme master of the situation. If the national bank endeavors to do anything which he thinks is in violation of the trust, he has absolute power to remove that national bank as trustee and appoint any other trustee in his place. All that we are doing by the law is to say that the Federal Reserve Board may enable these banks to act as trustees; but we do not, and, in my own opinion, I think probably we can not say that the national bank could be made a trustee or continued as a trustee if the probate judge having charge of the estate, or other judge, as the case may be, thought that the national bank was not properly executing its trust, so that the probate or other court is absolute master, in the final analysis.

Mr. ROBBINS. I doubt very much whether that would work out that way at all. I do not think this provision ought to be passed. I do not approve of it.

Mr. PHELAN. We have made some other provisions in this section to safeguard the interests of the beneficiary and to guarantee that the trust shall be most carefully executed. They are enumerated in the report better or more briefly, perhaps, than I can take them up here on the floor, but they are all matters intended to safeguard the proper care of the trust funds.

Now, as to section 3——

Mr. STEELE. At that point will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PHELAN. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE. Under the Federal reserve act, as I recollect the provision, the funds of the bank itself are withdrawn from State taxation; and is there any provision here, if you are going to withdraw fiduciary funds from State control and place them under Federal control, that determines whether those funds would still be subject to State taxation or whether it would still be an exclusively Federal function outside of the State jurisdiction?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not recall that the Federal reserve act in any particular removes from taxation by the State funds held by national banks.

Mr. STEELE. Not particularly, but if it does become a Federal function it would not be subject to State taxation unless Congress gave its consent to such taxation.

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman refers, I think, to the old national banking act.

Mr. STEELE. Yes. The same principle would apply here, unless there was some provision on the subject, I should say.

Mr. PHELAN. That is——

Mr. STEELE. If you withdraw these trust funds from State control and place them under Federal control, under the Federal banking system, then you place them under a Federal function——

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. Which would not ordinarily be subject to State taxation.

Mr. PHELAN. I see what the gentleman means.

Mr. STEELE. My inquiry is whether there is any provision in this bill dealing with that subject?

Mr. PHELAN. There is no provision in this bill dealing with that subject; no.

Mr. STEELE. Then the conclusion would necessarily follow that these funds would not be subject to State taxation.

Mr. PHELAN. I think not. I get the purpose of the gentleman. The national banking act provides that a national bank can not be taxed by the State——

Mr. STEELE. Except on its capital stock and real estate.

Mr. PHELAN. Except on its real estate. The capital stock is taxed in the hands of the holders of that stock. But I do not believe that under any interpretation this would mean that a national bank acting as a trustee for funds which are not its own, which can not under any interpretation be called assets of the bank itself, will be excepted from taxation as a trustee, but taxes would be imposed just as in the case of any other trustee. I do not believe that the national banking act would be construed in that way. The bill certainly does not make any provision that they shall be exempt.

Mr. MADDEN. It ought to make provision that they should be taxed, though.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not think that question would cause any trouble.

Mr. STEELE. I think it would.

Mr. HUSTED. I note that the Federal Reserve Board, under the provisions of this bill, in passing upon applications for permission to exercise the powers enumerated, is required to take into consideration the amount of capital and surplus of the applying bank, and is prohibited from issuing a permit to any national bank having a capital and surplus less than the capital and surplus required by State law of State banks, trust companies, and corporations exercising such powers.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Assume the two cases of two banks competing for business in the same community, one conforming to this requirement as to capital and surplus and the other bank not being strong enough to do so. Would not the enactment of this act, in the gentleman's opinion, give the stronger bank a very great advantage over the smaller bank in its competition for business in that community.

Mr. PHELAN. I presume it would be an advantage, yes; but here was the situation that confronted us. We were demanding that national banks should not be discriminated against in the various States. In fairness, even if we had the power, we ought not to endeavor to discriminate against State banks by the passage of our law. Now, if we had the power, and exercised it, and granted to banks of $25,000 capitalization this fiduciary power when a State would not permit a bank of such small capitalization to have such power, we would be discriminating against State banks, and indirectly against the State itself. We wanted to avoid any such difficulty.

Mr. HUSTED. I appreciate that, and sympathize with the purpose of the committee; but it seemed to me that this might work great injustice against the small banks which were unable to comply with the requirements of this section by enabling strong banks to get this business, which would bring other business along with it.

Mr. PHELAN. If that is an evil, I think it is the lesser of two evils.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 28 minutes.

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will be brief I will be glad to yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am always brief when addressing myself to the very concise gentleman from Massachusetts. Do I understand that this fund, deposited in a national bank in a separate department, will be impressed with the fiduciary character, so that it can not be utilized by the bank for its general purposes, and that thereby the bank does not become a debtor to the depositor, whether he is a trustee or not?

Mr. PHELAN. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it become a debtor, then the funds would still be relieved from the obligation of taxation.

Mr. PHELAN. I am not so sure of that.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understood the reply of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. PHELAN. Let me interrupt——

Mr. STAFFORD It was that these funds would be impressed with the trust character, so that they would still be subject to the taxation of the State.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; but that is no different than any other trustee, because then the bank as a trustee has to its credit a deposit of the bank in its independent capacity, and that deposit—the right to draw that money—is the asset it holds as a trustee; and if I am correct it can be taxed on that just the same as I, an individual, could be taxed on the same thing, the difference being that the bank now as an independent personality has the fund, and the money itself, or the fund, would not be taxable; but if the right to draw that money is taxable in any place in the hands of an individual, I think it would be just as much taxable to the bank as to a trustee. In other words, there are two items there—one to the bank as a bank, the other to the bank as trustee.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. On page 5, line 19, where the State authorities are permitted to inspect these accounts, is not that a rather unusual procedure for the State authorities to inspect a national institution?

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman's question is very pertinent. It is rather unusual, except that we have carefully safeguarded it so that it will be a very proper inspection. The State officials can inspect the assets of the trust—the trust fund. They can go into a national bank and examine those things that are segregated in the trust fund, but they can not go into the bank itself and look at any assets outside of the trust fund. In other words, it is simply limited to what the bank holds segregated in the trust, and you will see that no harm or injury can be done.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman thinks that by opening up to the State authority the inspection any danger would be averted?

Mr. PHELAN. We prohibit them from going into the bank itself and examining the general funds of the bank. They can go in and see whether the bank has so much stock, which it represents it has as trustee, or so many bonds; they can look at the books of the trust as they can of an individual trust, but when they try to step over into the assets of the bank then they are stopped.

Section 3 amends the present law so that Federal reserve notes may be issued of a larger denomination than at the present time. Under the present law $100 is the largest Federal reserve note permissible to be printed. Under our amendment we permit Federal reserve notes of $500, $1,000, $5,000, and $10,000 to be issued by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I intended to ask this question before the gentleman took up section 3. It is on the same line as the question propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE]. The legal ownership of this trust fund is in the bank. The bank is just as much the legal owner of the trust bonds as though they belonged to them and were a part of its assets. Has the gentleman considered the question of the taxability by the State from that standpoint?

Mr. PHELAN. I answered that in my answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE]. I would like to answer the gentleman more fully, but I would like to finish the bill in my own time.

We permit Federal reserve notes of larger denominations to be issued. The purpose is to conserve the gold supply, a very important thing to be done. At the present time certain individuals, corporations, and banks in particular, like notes of large denominations, which makes it easier for exchange purposes to pay off balances, and for other purposes.

At the present time the only notes of large denominations that they can get are gold certificates. They have no desire to have that kind of a certificate if they could get Federal reserve notes of large denominations. They are constantly withdrawing from the banks the large gold certificates, and thus constantly drawing on the gold supply of the Federal reserve banks. If Federal reserve banks can issue Federal reserve notes of a larger denomination every bank will be as willing to take them as it will the gold certificates, and the gold certificates can be retained by the Federal reserve banks. That is the whole purpose of the section.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. During the recent months I have had applications from Pittsburgh for more currency of small denomination—one and two dollar notes—for pay-roll purposes. Why would it not be an advantage to have bills of that denomination for that purpose? Why do you shut them out, which creates this stringency?

Mr. PHELAN. I think the stringency has been overcome, or will shortly be overcome, because there was a bill passed a few months ago enabling national banks to issue $1 and $2 notes, whereas under the law existing at the time they were permitted to issue nothing below $5 notes. I suppose there is a national-bank circulation of between seven hundred and eight hundred million dollars. This act gave authority to the national banks to issue the small notes. They now have the power, and they did not have the power. That is what led to the stringency. But there are other reasons why it is hardly advisable to issue Federal reserve notes of small denominations, which I do not wish to take time now to explain. I will say that in the bill passed Monday provision is made whereby one or two dollar notes can be issued by Federal reserve banks. I think the advisability of this, however, is very doubtful.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman makes a distinction between Federal reserve notes and Federal reserve bank notes.

Mr. PHELAN. I did not intend to use those two terms. I made a distinction between gold certificates and Federal reserve notes. The distinction is between the gold certificate and the notes issued by the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. FESS. Did we authorize the issue of $1 bills of greenback denomination?

Mr. PHELAN. I think we have not made any authorization referring to greenbacks at all, either in this Congress or any Congress of which I have been a Member.

Mr. FESS. Here is a note of the United States. Is it not a Federal reserve bank note?

Mr. PHELAN. No; it is a legal-tender note. I suppose it would be called a greenback.

Mr. FESS. Then we have authorized the issue of greenbacks.

Mr. PHELAN. No; the greenback was issued before I was born.

Mr. FESS. There were no greenbacks of a less denomination than $5 until we changed it.

Mr. PHELAN. The change we made referred to the national-bank notes.

Mr. FESS. It referred to greenbacks also, for this is issued in 1917. Will the gentleman allow me to ask one question more? Is it the policy to ultimately make the Federal reserve notes our exclusive paper money?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not know that that is the purpose. I think the desire of many interested in the subject is to have the Federal reserve notes used to the largest extent as our currency.

Mr. FESS. You have reduced from $100 denomination to $5 denomination the Federal reserve note.

Mr. PHELAN. Oh, no; it is the other way. We have not permitted the issue of Federal reserve notes of over $100 denomination up to date. The only change we are making in this bill is to include $500, $1,000, $5,000, and $10,000 notes. If I may go on, the next section, section 4, takes up section 19 of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will let me finish the bill, I shall be glad then to answer any question; but my time is almost used up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can not some arrangements be made whereby some of the time allotted on this side may be granted to the gentleman, so that he can properly respond to inquiries directed to him?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not like to monopolize the time, but I should be glad to answer any question that I can.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has charge of the bill and inquiries are being made in good faith.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining, and he can ask for additional time by unanimous consent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for one-half hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for one-half hour. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the disposition of that side with reference to further debate upon the bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I might say that there has been no arrangement made and I have had no calls for time. There are gentlemen on this side who I know will probably want to talk. I will suggest that we have some agreement, if that is necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to all gentlemen that under the new rule about Calendar Wednesday only two hours will be allowed, but the House has power to extend the time.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I might say that the gentleman is making a very careful explanation and analysis of the bill, and unless some gentleman on this side desires time beyond 30 minutes—I shall not consume over 10 minutes—I will be perfectly willing to yield 30 minutes of the hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not know what questions may come up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. That will not vary the rule of two hours of general debate?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. WINGO. That would mean that his additional time would come off the two hours?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; it simply extends his hour to an hour and a half.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is no time allowed for debate on this bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a House bill, and the gentleman is privileged to move the previous question at any time after two hours of debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MADDEN. Inasmuch as that is the case, and as nobody is in the House, except a few Members, to listen to the explanation—something that all Members ought to know—I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PHELAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that.

Mr. MADDEN. How can Members consider a bill like this if they are not here?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This vitally affects large institutions in my city and State, and I want to get more information about it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, there is a point of order of no quorum pending.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist upon his point of no quorum?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). Three hundred and three gentlemen have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, just a moment. At the time the point of no quorum was raised there was pending a request for unanimous consent to extend the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair, of course, was not in the chair at that time.

Mr. WINGO. That is the reason I made the suggestion; that is the pending question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will submit the request. Request is made that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] be extended 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], for the purpose of asking a conference.

SALE OF WAR MUNITIONS TO COBELLIGERENTS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (S. 3803) to authorize the President to sell munitions to our cobelligerents. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] understands the bill. The House amended that bill, and the Senate disagreed to the amendment, and I ask that the House insist on its amendment and agree to the conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3803, that the House insist on its amendment to the Senate bill and agree to the conference on the same asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are some Members on this side who want to know what that bill is, and I would like, if the gentleman will yield me about two minutes——

Mr. DENT. Briefly stated, this is a bill which authorizes the President of the United States to sell munitions or war supplies to our allies or cobelligerents and also to dispose of certain property which has become obsolete to private purposes and corporations. The bill passed the House about two weeks ago, but the House amended the Senate bill so as to change this feature. The Senate bill authorized each bureau or department to take the proceeds of the sale and apply them to its own purposes. The House amended that bill authorizing the covering of those proceeds into the Public Treasury. That is the amendment we are insisting upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair announces the following conferees: Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN.

AMENDING CERTAIN SECTIONS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT AND REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I had just concluded speaking about section 3 of this bill. Section 4 is an amendment to the present law with reference to the reserve requirements. Section 4 amends the present law in this respect. It permits the Federal Reserve Board to let down the reserve requirements in the case of particular banks which I shall specify. It permits the Federal Reserve Board in the case of banks situated in outlying districts of central reserve cities, which are New York, Chicago, and St. Louis, and in territory which has been incorporated within the municipal limits of those cities through expansion, to require of banks in such sections only such reserves as are required of banks in reserve cities or only such reserves as are required of country banks as the board may decide. It has a similar provision with reference to banks similarly located in reserve cities, so that in the case of those banks the Federal Reserve Board may require only those reserves required of country banks. Let me illustrate. Suppose some small bank is situated in the outskirts of the city of Chicago with a small capitalization at the present time. That bank, although its business may be purely local in its nature, is required to keep the same reserve as the largest bank in the city of Chicago. This bill will permit the Federal Reserve Board to require of that bank only 7 per cent reserve, the same reserve required of a country bank, or 10 per cent reserve, the same reserve required of a reserve city bank, instead of a 13 per cent reserve now required of that bank as a bank situated in a central reserve city. Another illustration: In the city of Boston, which is a reserve city, a bank with small capitalization may be situated in some outlying territory. The Federal Reserve Board under this amendment may require of that bank that it shall keep in reserve only the same reserve required of a country bank; that is, a bank situated in a small city; that is, 7 per cent reserve instead of 10 per cent. The purpose is to permit the Federal Reserve Board to let down the high reserve requirements when there is no occasion, from a business view, at all that those high reserve requirements should be maintained.

Section 5 is an important amendment to the present law. It amends section 22 of the Federal reserve act. When the committee reported the Federal reserve act it put in section 22 among the other provisions. At that time the committee had certain definite things in mind which it intended to prohibit. Those things were prohibited under that section, but owing to some confusion in interpretation of construction of that section a great deal of doubt arose in the minds of bankers and others concerned as to just what could and could not be done or what was or was not prohibited under that section. Subsequently the section has been amended in an effort to clarify the provisions of the original section, but there still has been confusion, so that bank directors, for example, and bank officers in particular have in some instances been in doubt whether or not they could borrow money from their own bank. This and many other instances arose which cause confusion and doubt. There was nobody who could tell authoritatively as to what could or could not be done, because no attorney connnected with the Federal Reserve Board or Treasury Department or anyone connected with the Department of Justice could tell what a court would hold, nor was any such individual authorized to give a definite construction of the section. We have amended the section in such a way that I think there is absolutely no uncertainty about it. When we have so clarified it we have at the same time modified it greatly, and I think the modification we have made will not only meet with the approval of the people at large, but will meet with the approval of the bank directors and officials themselves, and, in fact, will be heartily indorsed by them. Indeed, that has been the case so far as we have heard from anybody relative to this provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Gladly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House as to the provisions of the existing law sought to be modified by the existing law as to the authority that banks now have to purchase securities from directors direct or from any firm of which the director is a member?

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will just wait one minute, I will answer that question.

In the bill subsections (a) and (b) are simply reenactments of existing law. We have not changed a word in those subsections.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, there is a typographical omission, to which I wish to direct his attention, in paragraph (c), on page 11, line 17, which may have already been called to his attention. After the word "not," in line 17, the word "more" should be inserted.

Mr. PHELAN. In the remaining subsections we have greatly modified the present law, and under the bill as amended this is the situation: Under subsection (c) the director of a bank will be prohibited—or any official, for that matter—from getting any commission through any service rendered by him in obtaining a loan or getting a note or other similar obligation discounted at the bank. There has been an evil practice in this country, whereby men on the inside would get commissions on the side for favors done outsiders who wanted to have their notes discounted or who wanted to borrow money. This subsection is aimed to prevent that evil from being continued. I will say that that is already provided for in the present law, but this clarifies it and confines it to that general purpose.

Under subsection (e) provision is made whereby a director, officer, attorney, or employee of a bank can not get a higher rate of interest on his deposit than anybody outside of the bank. The justice of it is so plain that it needs no explanation.

Now, in subsection (d) we have modified the present law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where is the gentleman starting?

Mr. PHELAN. In subsection (d), at the bottom of page 11. At the present time I think there is no doubt that a man can not sit on a board of directors of a bank and at the same time, either as an individual or as a member of a firm or corporation, sell securities to that bank. For example, John Smith could not be a director of the First National Bank of Washington and at the same time sell the First National Bank bonds, stocks, or other similar securities. That is the present law. The enactment of the law resulted in driving men in the security business off the boards of directors of national banks in many places in the United States. The banks have complained that the services of those men could very well be employed as experts in securities the banks purchased, whether from that particular concern or some other concern, and that it was very advantageous to have such men on the board of directors. We have permitted under this subsection men to serve in those capacities, directors or officials of the bank, and at the same time not be permitted from selling securities to the bank, but we have put in such provision that the interests of the banks are carefully safeguarded, so that men holding those positions may not be able to sell the bank securities at a disadvantage to the bank. Close examination of the sections will show how carefully that has been safeguarded.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Gladly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Wherein is the banking situation improved by allowing a bank to purchase securities from a director, even though the provision states upon terms not less favorable to the bank than those offered to others? Certainly the bank is not generally in the business of purchasing securities, and I can well imagine a case where a director might use some ulterior influence to induce the bank to purchase securities, even at market value, not to the advantage of the bank, but to his own direct advantage, and even with the support of the majority of the board of directors as is provided in this section when they are offered at other than the prevailing quotations. What is the pressing need, from the bank situation, that we should come to the relief of a director, perchance, who is in the brokerage business for the selling of securities?

Mr. PHELAN. I will answer the gentleman. If we regard the banking business simply from the point of theory, I think the argument would tend all this way, that a man ought not to sit on a board of directors and do any business himself directly with that bank, even to the extent of borrowing money from it. Speaking of it as a purely banking question, it would be better that a director of a bank should not be allowed to borrow from that bank. But in this country our banking business has grown up in a different way. We have a large number, between 7,000 and 8,000 national banks, and in all these little communities the very men who are likely to do the borrowing from the banks are the men who will do most to make the banks strong as directors. For one reason, it is because of the multiplicity of the banks. It has been the custom, it has been the way the banking business has grown up, and although it is not entirely consistent with the best banking principles, we have to meet a practical situation. Always, therefore, directors could borrow from their own banks, and up to the time we passed the Federal reserve act there was practically no limitation on that.

The same applies, although to a less degree, perhaps, to men engaged in various security businesses. In the larger cities in particular, men who engage in the sale of securities of various kinds would be of great value to banks and their boards of directors because of the familiarity not only with securities they sell but with securities of various kinds sold all over the United States. Many banks have said that directors of that kind have been of great advantage, and they have missed those men when they have been taken off the board. Hence the committee felt we ought to go at this thing in a liberal spirit, provided we safeguarded things so that it is difficult if not impossible for an abuse to grow up out of what we frame; that we ought so far as possible to liberalize the provisions relative to the board of directors of these various banks.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. In response to the suggestion that directors should not be allowed to sell stock and bonds to banks, there is nothing in the present law that prevents them from selling them without limitation, is there? I do not find anything in the present law that prevents their selling them. This provision is framed with a desire to regulate it and make it safer.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not believe there has been a good argument advanced so far why this privilege should be granted to them.

Mr. PHELAN. The present law provides that they shall not sit on the boards that pass upon the purchase of those stocks and bonds from themselves. This provision includes real estate as well as securities. There are many cases where it is likely to embarrass the banks if this is not clarified in this way.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not profess to be informed as to these cases, but the gentleman was speaking with reference to the custom in the small banks. I know that there is one bank in my district that advertises that no officer, agent, or employee of the bank owes the bank one cent. It keeps that as a standing advertisement. I also heard the gentleman who is the president of that bank state—probably it was too sweeping an assertion—that no bank had ever failed and lost the depositors one dollar unless there had been loans made to some of the officers of the bank.

Mr. PHELAN. That may apply to the gentleman's town, but in my city the principal business men of the city—it is a big industrial city—are directors of those banks, and any bank that is being formed will go out and look for those men, because those men know the business community and know what is going on, and through their own business activity they can better protect the interests of the bank than others could do. This is generally true throughout the United States. In our national banking system the loss to the depositors since the national banking system was established in the sixties has been so small as to be almost negligible, in spite of occasional national-bank failures.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Under the law the only kind of bank that the Federal Government has control over is the national bank, and the law prohibits the national bank from loaning to any man or any set of men more than 10 per cent of the capital and surplus.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Why does the gentleman believe that no bank should loan a director of that bank? Why do you make that suggestion? What reason have you why the bank should not loan to the director of that bank?

Mr. PHELAN. I am afraid the gentleman did not fully understand me. I said that, looking at it simply and purely from the point of view of theory, it would be better not to have that practice engaged in, but I am in favor of permitting them to do it because of the way the banking business is done in this country, and because of practice and because of custom we are reporting a bill here which clarifies the situation. Under it there will be very few limitations put upon directors of banks from borrowing from their banks, and they are given greater powers than are permitted them under the present existing law. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PHELAN. I was simply discussing it from the point of view of banking theory when loans were made to officers and directors of those banks.

Mr. FORDNEY. I was simply discussing the matter from the point of view of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], that no losses were sustained by banks where loans were not made to officers and directors. I will say that the bank is better able to know the value of a loan made to an officer or director than to any other customer of that bank, and I know no good reason why a loan should not be made to an officer or director as freely as to any other customer of the bank.

Mr. PHELAN. I think that with the provision that we put in this law, with the proper administration of the law by the proper officials charged with the administration of the law, there is no danger or little danger of what the gentleman from Iowa suggests.

The other amendment simply provides for penalties in case any of these provisions are violated by the various officials mentioned.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. If my colleague will permit me, I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that by subdivision (c) and subdivision (d) we attempt to clear up a proposition that is set forth in section 22 of the Federal reserve act. The second paragraph, or the second subdivision, in the Federal reserve act had this language:

Other than the usual salary or director's fee paid to any officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank, and other than a reasonable fee paid by said bank to such officer, director, employee, or attorney for services rendered to such bank, no officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank shall be a beneficiary of or receive, directly or indirectly, any fee, commission, gift, or other consideration for or in connection with any transaction or business of the bank: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit a director, officer, employee, or attorney from receiving the same rate of interest paid to other depositors for similar deposits made with such bank: And provided further, That notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other evidences of debt executed or indorsed by directors or attorneys of a member bank may be discounted with such member bank on the same terms and conditions as other notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or evidences of debt upon the affirmative vote or written assent of at least a majority of the members of the board of directors of such member bank—

And so on. That language which I read to you was compromise language. We labored in the Committee on Banking and Currency over that proposition for a week, and we added a phrase here and cut out one there, and the result is we have a compromise provision in the present law that a great many of the lawyers differ about as to what it means.

Here is what we intended to provide by it: First, to prevent an undue advantage being taken of national banks and member banks by directors sitting on the board and purchasing for the bank securities from other corporations of which they are directors. Another was to prevent the officers or employees of the bank from getting commissions for loans made by the bank. In the present bill we separate those two propositions clearly and treat them in unequivocal language.

There is a difference of opinion as to what the present law does. I differ with the gentleman from Massachusetts as to just what the present law does. I contended at the time that we did not reach what we said we were reaching. But there is no question but that this paragraph in this bill will clarify and give what those interested on both sides will agree is a fair, clear statement of what we intended to do when we enacted the present law.

Mr. PHELAN. At any rate, there has been a great deal of confusion in the interpretation, and we have made it absolutely certain what is meant. We have put the bank directors in a position where they will not have to ask anybody what they can do. They can go right ahead and do everything within reason without making any inquiry of anybody as to what they can do in this respect. There is no section in this bill which will so fully relieve bank directors and officers as to the uncertainty now existing regarding their powers.

I will add that we have been extremely liberal. We have incorporated in this amendment provisions which they did not even ask for, because I think it was their impression that the committee was much more desirous of restricting them than the committee actually was.

Mr. JUUL. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he stated that the privileges granted under subsection (d) were so guarded that practically no harm could come from the powers granted in the section. Yet I find by looking over the section fairly carefully that the only restriction imposed in the bill is that when any director, or any firm of which he is a member, acting for or on behalf of others, sells securities or other property to a member bank, the Federal Reserve Board by regulation may, in any or all cases, require a full disclosure to be made, and that when they sell such securities and the directors vote for it they are required to go on record in writing as having voted for it. Now, what good will that do after the bank is filled up with worthless securities and there is nothing left in cash?

Mr. PHELAN. This is a technical subject.

Mr. JUUL. I understand.

Mr. PHELAN. It is very easy to get a little confused about it, but I will ask the gentleman to read the whole section.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman pardon me for finishing my question? The safeguard that is offered is that the directors must give an affirmative vote or a written assent to the transaction. Is not that correct?

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman repeat that question?

Mr. JUUL. You say here—

Such authority to be evidenced by the affirmative vote or written assent of such directors.

In other words, they may do anything in the way of buying securities from themselves in their capacity as business men. They may come in, in their capacity as business men, and sell securities to the bank, and then sit in their capacity as directors of the bank, and if they go on record in writing they may buy anything they like.

Mr. PHELAN. That is not the situation.

Mr. JUUL. Does not the subsection say that?

Mr. PHELAN. The section provides that a member bank may purchase securities, and that includes real estate. I want the gentleman to keep that in mind; for instance, real estate that they buy on a foreclosure process.

Mr. JUUL. They are compelled to buy in that case.

Mr. PHELAN. Just a minute. They may buy these securities on the same terms as anybody else. So that in that case, where it is an offering of securities on the market, the bank, when it buys just as an individual buys, is in just the same position as anybody else, and there is practically no danger and no trouble, but such purchase is to be authorized by a majority not interested in the transaction, such authority to be evidenced by the affirmative vote or written assent in those cases where the purchase price is different from the market price, as the gentleman will notice. So that in the ordinary case the bank is protected, because it is buying the securities just as anybody else is buying them, and the market determines the price. The bank is protected in the other case, because if a contingency should arise where it needed to buy something at a different price from somebody else to protect the interests of the bank, then it would be protected by requiring the written assent or majority vote of a majority of the bank directors not interested in the transaction, men who will not have any desire to help the seller of the securities, because there is nothing to come to them from the sale; and also protected by the requirement that in any case the Federal Reserve Board may require a full disclosure, and if there is anything of that kind that is the least bit suspicious I have no doubt that the Federal Reserve Board will require such disclosure. If that is not safeguarding it the committee does not know any reasonable method in which it can safeguard it.

Mr. JUUL. I will ask the gentleman if it is not tempting Director Brown to sell to-day, and Smith and Jones, who are not selling to-day, to vote with Brown? To-morrow the gentleman who was selling to-day sits in his capacity as a director and passes on the transaction wherein another director comes in and wants to sell something.

Mr. PHELAN. I agree that anything is possible; but if you can conceive of men sitting on a board of directors and swapping back and forth in that way, when these men know that they have got to get a majority vote of the other directors, and know that the Federal Reserve Board in five minutes can order a disclosure of that thing, and if any underhanded business is going on will show them up to the whole world, then I think we might just as well not attempt to legislate on this matter. We have got to presume that men are going to be reasonably honest——

Mr. JUUL. The country from New York to San Francisco is strewn with the wrecks of banks whose directors have loaned funds to themselves and done that and sold securities to themselves that they never would have accepted from outsiders.

Mr. PHELAN. The difference has been that in those cases the men who have been doing it have been in the majority. Enough of the directors have been interested and have profited from it so that they would vote for it, whereas here the men who vote, or give their written assent, are men who receive no benefit except where the benefit is to the bank, and not from the sale. And moreover the transactions to which the gentleman refers have been done in such a way that they would not reach the public light until some time subsequently. But with the watch that the comptroller and the Federal Reserve Board will have upon these banks, and their power to order a full disclosure, I think there is no danger of what the gentleman anticipates.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has given a very full explanation of the changes made in the law by this bill, and he may have answered the question that I am about to ask. I notice the rather unusual form of stating the first amendment in this measure, and I wondered why the other amendments were not stated in the same way. The committee set forth the language as it now stands in the act, and then the amendment as it will appear. They state the language that they strike out or amend, and the language as it will appear. In the second amendment, all that they set forth is the act as it is amended, as has been customary in the past. May I ask the reason for making the distinction between the first amendment and the various other sections that are amended?

Mr. PHELAN. That question is a pertinent one. My recollection as to the reason for that is this, that, if you will notice, in the other sections we could very positively identify what we wanted stricken out and what we wanted to put in place thereof, whereas in the first section of the amendment we are taking out something right in the middle of the section, not marked out as a subsection or as a section. We thought the easiest and most convenient way of indicating just what we wanted to strike out and just what we wanted to replace in place of what was stricken out was by doing it in this manner. For example, these words, page 1, line 7, "directors of class A and class B shall be chosen in the following manner," come right along in another section, without any different marks separating them in their particular section. In the second section it says "eleven (K)," and that identifies a particular subsection standing in the Federal reserve act all by itself. In the first section we could not very well identify it so closely, and hence we repeated the words of the present law.

Mr. WALSH. It will appear now, if this should become a law—the Federal reserve act will appear with this section repeated, the language amending it following it; a part of the amendment will be a repetition of the section as it is and as it is amended.

Mr. PHELAN. That all depends on how they publish the Federal reserve act.

Mr. WALSH. They will have to publish it as Congress passes it.

Mr. PHELAN. They will have to leave the section as it is, because there will be no authoritative issue of the laws until Congress passes a revised edition. As the statutes come out they will come out separately, as the gentleman knows. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 12 minutes.

Mr. PHELAN. I want to reserve some part of my time. The next two sections, while long and complicated and I think extremely difficult to understand without some study yet in reality are very simple when it is understood what is done. They simply apply the existing law with reference to national banks to the Federal reserve banks. In other words, strange as it may seem, there is no statute law punishing officers or employees of the Federal reserve banks for overcertification of checks and other offenses. There is such a statute relative to national banks. We make these statutes which punish a man for committing the offenses enumerated while they are officers and employees of national banks apply to the officers and employees of Federal reserve banks. While there is a great deal of language in the sections, that is what is done.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I note on page 15, after the recital on page 14, it makes it unlawful to certify checks not on deposit, and provides that anyone who shall certify a check before the amount thereof shall be regularly entered to the credit of the drawer upon the books of the bank, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. It seems to me it would be better to keep the form you have on the previous page and say unless the money is on deposit. For the reason that in large banks money is taken in at one counter and checked or drawn out at another, and yet it may not have been entered on the books of deposit.

Mr. PHELAN. That point is very well taken, and I think without any doubt if we had been writing the original law we might have written it differently. That provision is in the present law. It has been in the national bank law a great many years and no trouble has arisen, which seems to indicate that the Comptroller's Office, or whoever has the power, has construed that reasonably and fairly so that no one will be taken up simply because he has not made a bookkeeping entry except in regular course. I think the gentleman's point, however, is very well taken.

Mr. CANNON. But it is on the ticket of deposit.

Mr. PHELAN. They have interpreted it, I think, liberally.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I will yield to the gentleman; but, as I said, I want a little time left.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am willing to yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has not been recognized, but the Chair, of course, will recognize him later.

Mr. WINGO. Let the gentleman from Massachusetts reserve the balance of his time and then let the gentleman from Pennsylvania be recognized.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. McFADDEN was recognized.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] and reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. PHELAN. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the form of this bill, to the matter that was spoken of by the gentleman's colleague from Massachusetts. I do not think I ever saw before a bill in this form, and I believe it would be very objectionable, in my judgment, if it passed in this form. Of course the only possible object of repeating the existing law in full is for the information of the committee in its deliberations. But now if this bill is enacted into law and should not be changed in the Senate, we will have a law amending an existing law in which the existing law will be recited in full and an amendment in the nature of a substitute will be stated in full. That is an anomaly in legislation. It ought not to be published in that way, and thus be set out in our Statutes at Large.

It would certainly be better before the bill is passed finally to state that the act is amended to read as follows—reciting the substitute enactment.

Mr. PHELAN. The only important thing is to make absolutely certain what we intend to do. We could reenact section 4 of the Federal reserve act, which would take more space and cause more confusion. The reason why we put it in this way I have already stated, to have it in such a way as to make it clear what change we intend to make.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are several penal clauses in the latter part of the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are they new?

Mr. PHELAN. I just explained, and probably the gentleman was not in the Chamber at the time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was not sure that they were new.

Mr. PHELAN. We have applied the language of the national bank act relative to the punishment of officers and employees for certain offenses to the employees and officials of the Federal reserve banks. Under the existing law, for example, there is no statute providing for the punishment of an employee of a Federal reserve bank who overcertifies a bank check, and probably there is no law applying directly to the case of an employee of a Federal reserve bank who embezzles. We have simply applied those statutes of the national bank act to the officials and employees of Federal reserve banks.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Those provisions were not included in the original Federal reserve act.

Mr. PHELAN. To apply to Federal reserve banks, they were not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Have such offenses arisen throughout the country as to give occasion for the enactment of this law?

Mr. PHELAN. I will say confidentially to the gentleman that there is a man now serving time about whose conviction there is considerable doubt as to whether or not they had any authority to put him in jail, just because of the lack of a provision of this kind.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That answers the question. These changes are made necessary by reason of occurrences that have taken place since the enactment of the Federal reserve law?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would return to section 7, on page 13, of the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. SIEGEL. And now turn to page 9, section 5. Should not section 7 be section 6? Is not that a misprint?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; that is.

Mr. SIEGEL. I suggest that that can be corrected by unanimous consent.

Mr. PHELAN. We can attend to that later on.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I just want to ask the gentleman if he desires to make a correction in lines 22, 23, and 24, on page 16? The violation of the act is classified here as a misdemeanor, and yet it carries a penitentiary sentence of five years. Should not that be a felony?

Mr. PHELAN. I will say to the gentleman that that question was considered in the committee and there is a good deal of justification for the gentleman's suggestion, but we felt this way about it: That same thing applies to many of our Federal statutes, resulting in great confusion, and we felt, in view of that, that we better not make any change in existing law at this time; it might continue the debate and bring us into a great many difficulties, but we think that at some time or other our statutes ought to be gone over very carefully for the purpose of so amending them that that difficulty will be taken care of.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The point raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] is an important one, because of the discretion vested in the court by this bill. The gentleman will observe that the convicted person is to be fined not more than $5,000 nor imprisoned not more than five years. In some States in my State at least, the sentence of a year in the penitentiary is a sentence for a felony. A State prison incarceration for a year means conviction for a felony. If you call it a misdemeanor and leave it to a court to imprison for not more than five years, must he not imprison the convicted man for less than one year in order to make the sentence conform to the definition of a misdemeanor?

Mr. PHELAN. I doubt it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. These are interpreted in the light of the statutes of the State where the law is enforced in the Federal court.

Mr. PHELAN. I doubt if that would be done.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There ought to be no doubt about it, because a man who embezzles trust funds in a bank ought to go to the penitentiary for not less than five years.

Mr. PHELAN. I agree with the gentleman that it is an important question, but in trying to pass bank amendments we did not want to get into a question which applies not only to this but to many other statutes adopted by Congress.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why not strike out the word "misdemeanor" and leave in the language "shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned more than one year"?

Mr. PHELAN. We have tried to reenact existing law. We do not want to get into that question now, and we have thought it better some time later to endeavor to go over these statutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We are proposing to enact a penal statute right here, as far as this particular provision is concerned. Why not make it exact and do away with any ambiguity; just strike out the word "misdemeanor" and leave in the language "shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned more than one year."

Mr. PHELAN. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I make a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and seventy-seven Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to go into a long discussion of this measure, because the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], who has charge of the bill, has made a very careful detailed statement covering the various sections of this measure. I would, however, like to make a few observations in regard to the Federal reserve act and the reason for these amendments. We have heard ever since the passage of the Federal reserve act, those of us who are on this side of the House, that that act was a perfect instrument, but from my knowledge and experience here in the House for three years we have been continually amending this so-called perfect act, until now there are pending in the various committees probably thirty-odd amendments, which would therefore seem to prove beyond all question that the Federal reserve act was not a perfect act. So far as these special amendments are concerned, the first amendment corrects an error in the law actually worked out in its operation. I heartily approve of this, because I do not believe that the same men who control large banks should also control the actions of the smaller banks. In the formation of the Federal reserve act you will all remember that the banks were classified into groups—the large banks in a group, the medium-sized banks and the small banks into two separate groups, and each of these three classes of banks were to have representation on the regional board of directors. This act corrects an error which has developed in that law in the selection of directors. Section 2 attempts to correct a flaw in the original enactment of the Federal reserve act. One might think from the discussion which has taken place here to-day that this section 2 is an entirely new provision. That is not so. These powers were intended to be extended to member banks in the original act, and this is only a modification because of the objections which were raised by the State banks and trust companies. This matter was taken into the courts and has been tested out. The enactment of this section into the law finally in the Supreme Court will permit these banks to have the powers which were originally intended in the Federal reserve act. I believe that if it did have for its purpose the driving out of business the State banks and trust companies, and would place them under the Federal Reserve System, that that would be a strong argument for the enactment of this section. I do not think, however, that is the case. I do not believe that it will so work out. Now, so far as the other sections of this bill are concerned, they are merely correcting various phases of the present law that are necessary to make it workable, and I do not care to discuss them. I am therefore going to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], who is acting this afternoon as the ranking member of the minority on this bill, has made his clear statement about "the perfect act" we are now amending. When the Federal reserve act was passed it was generally announced that it was "a perfect piece of constructive legislation." That was widely commented upon during the last campaign. It has tended, it is true, to bring the various banking forces of the country together into a sort of central bank, which the party in power had previously denounced, but people believed that it was a good piece of legislation, and due credit was given to those who originated it and brought it into effect. But it is true also that that act has been amended from time to time. Experience is a great teacher. Experience has shown that in some instances this so-called perfect piece of legislation has not been so perfect as its authors believed it to be. It appears from the amendments that we are asked to adopt to-day that there were certain oversights not hitherto caught up with in previous amendments to the act, as, for instance, the penal clause relating to the use of certified checks——

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I would like to know whether this present act takes away or attempts to take away any of the rights enjoyed by the trust companies under State banking laws?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It certainly does, and as soon as I get through with one or two suggestions about the things which were overlooked in the original Federal reserve act——

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (continuing). I shall be glad to revert to this trust-company question.

Mr. FOCHT. Reverting to the genesis of this act, I would like to have the gentleman say something as to the relationship of Senator Aldrich, whether the Democratic Party did not take up the bill where Senator Aldrich left off, and is responsible for the necessity of these amendments?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, I have steadfastly refused to discuss politics during these strenuous war times [laughter], but I am inclined to think that the so-called Vreeland-Aldrich law was a very able forerunner for the Federal reserve act and afforded very great relief in strenuous financial times, now happily past. But, of course, the Vreeland-Aldrich Act was "an offensive partisan" measure, which it was necessary should be supplanted by "a perfectly nonpartisan" financial measure, which the present Federal reserve act is represented to be.

Mr. SLOAN. The large outstanding fact of the proposed Aldrich-Vreeland Act was a central bank, was it not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Vreeland-Aldrich Act did not contemplate a central bank. It was intended to relieve a situation of financial stress, and when brought into full force and effect by an administration whose champions had vigorously and bitterly opposed it, it did prove effective—a sort of life-saver.

Mr. SLOAN. As I understand, you are speaking of one part of the Aldrich-Vreeland Act, but I referred to the Aldrich-Vreeland system of banks which had for its principal feature the central bank.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I decline to go into the matter of politics, even at the suggestion of my friend from Nebraska, and must confine myself to the financial phases of this bill.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman has always kept out of politics, but I thought to-day he might let me in.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman from Nebraska, who is coming very rapidly to higher honors in his great State, if he knows that when we passed the Federal reserve act we omitted punishment for an officer of a bank who might grant a gratuity to a bank examiner?

Mr. SLOAN. I did not know that. I thought with a perfect system we would have perfect men.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman did not know that, I will inform him that we are catching up with that oversight, which occurred when we passed the Federal reserve act.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] if he was aware when we passed the Federal reserve act that we made no provision for the punishment of those who might improperly and unlawfully permit the issue of certified checks? Did the gentleman know that?

Mr. SNYDER. I do not recall that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will inform the gentleman from New York, who is usually well versed in financial matters and does not dabble in politics, that we are correcting that now.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to ask the gentleman if he recalls that when the war originally broke out and the money stringency came on that the Aldrich-Vreeland Act was used to the extent of issuing $375,000,000 of currency?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not subscribe to the exact figures stated by the gentleman, but I believe the gentleman's recollection is absolutely correct when he infers that when the Democratic Party was in great stress over a probable financial stringency in the United States—some time before the war—it resorted with alacrity, with avidity, I might say, and without regard to politics, to the Vreeland-Aldrich Act to relieve the situation.

Mr. SNYDER. I just wanted to call the gentleman's attention to that in passing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am going to ask the gentleman, so long as he is on his feet, if he is aware that when we passed the Federal reserve act no provision was made for the punishment of a Federal reserve agent or of a Federal reserve board that permitted the misplacement or abstraction or willful misapplication of moneys, funds, or securities intrusted to their care?

Mr. SNYDER. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are lots of things the gentleman from New York and some others of us evidently have not caught up with. I am only advising the gentleman from Nebraska and the gentleman from New York and other gentlemen who are inquiring about this bill that we are now going through the process of perfecting a perfect bill; that we are now, through the happy auspices of the eloquent and assiduous gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN], who heads the committee to-day, catching up with those things we overlooked in those good old days when we did talk politics.

There is one thing in this bill, however, to which I wish to call attention, and that is section 2, which proposes to give to the Federal reserve banks all the rights and privileges that trust companies now enjoy under the laws of a State; and I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that that section will have a serious effect upon the trust companies of Pennsylvania. Some reference has been made to those of New York, I think——

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman understand we granted authority for the purpose of doing business under this act beyond that which exists in the present law?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; but I think the gentleman is setting up the Federal banks here to absorb the business that is now done by well-established trust companies in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WINGO. We do that under existing law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know why it should be emphasized in this bill, unless it is another case of perfecting the Federal reserve act.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it not now the law that a trust company can enter the Federal Reserve System?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I so understand it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And some of them avail themselves of that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And some of them do not. I do not know why when a national bank has not been permitted to become a trustee, or executor, or guardian, or a number of other things, and a trust company has been organized in good faith to give the public that service, and has made good, that the Federal reserve bank should come along and say: "Now that you are successful, we will absorb what you have done and take over your business." That is not a fair proposition, but it is the situation here.

Mr. ROSE. In the statement made a short time ago, you said that this bill would take away the rights of the trust companies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To a certain extent, yes; it competes with the trust companies and gives the Federal banks the right to absorb their business.

Mr. ROSE. It opens up competition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It undoubtedly does, and will put the Federal banks into the trust-company business.

But there is another objection to it, and I would like my friends on the other side to understand this objection: If there ever was any justification for Andrew Jackson's complaint against a central bank there is certainly justification to-day for the suggestion that by reason of the gradual absorption of business by the Federal Reserve System, the taking over of State banks, trust companies, and so forth, through the Federal Reserve System, there will be created what in effect will be the most powerful central bank that ever existed. I do not know whether that is the purpose of the bill, but it contributes to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum present. It is evident that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and seventy-two Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the committee, I am delighted to have so large an audience here this afternoon to hear the discussion of this proposed amendment of the Federal reserve banking law.

I want to oppose very vigorously the enactment of section 2 of this bill. The Federal reserve banking act, which was passed in 1914 and amended down as late as June 21, 1917, provides in section 11, clause (k)—

> To grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of State or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds under such rules and regulations as the said board may prescribe.

That is the clause I want to call to your attention. This present bill now proposes to amend the Federal reserve bank act, and in section 2 of this bill, on page 4, line 25, it adds to the provision that I have just read these words:

> Guardian of estates, assignee, receiver, committee of estate of lunatics, or in any other fiduciary capacity in which State banks, trust companies, or other corporations which come into competition with national banks are permitted to act under the laws of the State in which the national bank is located.

Then follow, gentlemen of the committee, more than two pages and a half of provisions, practically three pages of provisions, for the operation and regulation of a complete system of trust accounts and investments, with penal provisions for the violation of these requirements under this provision, showing clearly that it is the intention of this bill and those who are advocating it to confer upon national banks the complete power to act as trust companies are now authorized to do when acting as trustees, committees, and so forth, and also to give bond and act in "any other fiduciary capacity" without any restriction whatever.

Now, those of us who have in our respective States a well-defined system of trust companies that have been organized under existing law must necessarily be confronted with a problem as to how this is going to affect our home situation and the present amicable relations existing between the banks and trust companies. Speaking for the State of Pennsylvania, from which I come and, in part, have the honor to represent here, and knowing something about its banking laws and the practical operation of its banks, both National, State, and trust companies, because we have in that State four well-defined systems of banking—national banks, trust companies, State banks, and private banks—I may remark that the State banks, trust companies, and private banks are all examined by examiners working under the authority of the State of Pennsylvania—examined every four months. The national banks, of course, are examined by the national-bank examiners under the jurisdiction of the United States. In 1885 and subsequently, by various statutes, we created in our State a system of trust companies, the last general law being approved on June 11, 1885, Public Law 451. These trust companies are empowered to act as guardians, receivers, insure titles, and act as committees of lunacy, guardians, and so forth, and to act in other fiduciary relations, including those of bondsmen in our orphans' and common pleas courts. But all those trust institutions, gentlemen of the committee, are under the control of the particular court which appoints them. If a trust company is in the orphans' court, as in the case of the settlement of an estate by an administrator or an executor, it is required to file accounts, which are examined in the orphans' court by an auditor appointed for that purpose. It is compelled to go into court and render an account to the court of any trust funds in its hands, and these funds can be invested only under the direction of the court. If these trust companies are acting as committees of lunacy, they are subject to the jurisdiction of our court of common pleas, and they are bound to go into court for permission and approval of every act which they commit in the discharge of that trust, and at the expiration of the trust they must file an account, and it is audited and disposed of in that court by due process of law.

Here you propose to put the national banks in the situation of these trust companies, with full power and authority to perform all these acts. No State court will have sufficient jurisdiction over these national banks because they are institutions created by Federal statute.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to ask the gentleman if he is not aware that at the present time this right is given in the national-bank law and that in many States of the Union national banks exercise this right at the present time? The reason for modifying the act in this form is because the trust companies and State banks objected to these rights, and the matter was carried up to the Supreme Court of the United States, and this legislation is in conformity with a decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; in the beginning of my remarks I read these very words in the Federal reserve bank act, which confers the power that the national banks now have authority to exercise. But the Supreme Court of the United States in Two hundred and forty-fourth United States Reports, page 516, in the case of the National Bank of Bay City, Mich., against Fellows, passed upon this clause (k) of section 11 of the Federal reserve act, which this bill now proposes to amend, and the court held, which will be of interest to the lawyers of this House:

A business not inherently such—

I quote from the syllabus, which is a brief statement of the law as it is adjudicated in the case, the decision being quite a long one—that Congress may empower banks to engage in it may nevertheless become appropriate to their functions if, by State law, State banking corporations, trust companies, or other rivals of national banks are permitted to carry it on.

Further on the court, in passing on section 11, clause (k), says of the act of December 23, 1913, establishing the Federal Reserve Board, as follows:

To grant by special permit to national banks applying therefor, when not in contravention of State or local law, the right to act as trustee, executor, administrator, or registrar of stocks and bonds under such rules and regulations as the said board may prescribe, is, as here construed, a valid exercise of the power of Congress. The section authorizes the specified functions to be exercised by national banks when the right to perform them is given by State law, or is deducible therefrom through being so conferred on State banks or corporations whose business in some degree rivals that of national banks; and it gives administrative power to the Reserve Board as a means of coordinating such functions, in their exercise by national banks, with the reasonable and nondiscriminating provisions of State law regulating their exercise as to State corporations.

That section confers certain limited powers on national banks, but it does not allow them to become trustees, executors, bondsmen, or receivers, or "act in any other fiduciary capacity." It does not allow them to enter indiscriminately into the field that has heretofore been given over to trust companies exclusively, in my State at least, and, I believe, in every other State of this Union.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROSE. What is the gentleman's judgment as to this question: If this bill should pass, would not the national banks come under the same laws as to examining and filing accounts in court and having them passed on by auditors as trust companies now do?

Mr. ROBBINS. Not without further legislation of Congress. The State courts are very jealous and careful and exceedingly cautious about invading the field occupied by national banks, and I know that in the State of Pennsylvania they never do.

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman does not mean that the courts could not require the same rendering of accounts that is required under State law?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will say this, from my experience in the courts of common pleas, the orphans' court of the State of Pennsylvania, and the quarter sessions courts—and I have had some experience in them—they will not invade the province of the national banks, because they are created by act of Congress, and are answerable to the Federal courts, and are exclusively in the Federal jurisdiction, either criminal or civil. The State courts are very careful not to invade that jurisdiction.

Mr. STEVENSON. Did the gentleman overlook lines 18 to 21 on page 5 of this bill?

Mr. ROBBINS. Not at all. These lines contain an express limitation restricting the examination to be made.

Mr. STEVENSON. Those lines provide that—

Such books and records shall be open to inspection by the State authorities to the same extent as the books and records of corporations organized under State law which exercise fiduciary powers.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have read that section, but it does not give the authority to our local courts. I think that refers to a bank examiner and provides that he may go in there and examine these accounts only so far as trust funds under State jurisdiction are concerned, and grants no authority should such permission be withheld.

Now, let us look at the practical situation should this legislation be enacted and enforced in Pennsylvania. During the last 30 years in Pennsylvania we have developed great trust companies, because before the general act of 1885 was passed we chartered these companies in Pennsylvania by special legislation and they enjoyed special privileges, like the company for insurance of lives and granting annuities, in Philadelphia. Our trust companies incorporated under our general law have grown up into strong financial institutions, like the Union Trust Co. in the city of Pittsburgh, whose capital and surplus amount to more than $34,000,000. This bill does not preserve these institutions when they exist under special statutes conferring special franchises or under general law and possess general powers.

Now, gentlemen, why not frankly state the real purpose of this bill? Why not strip the mask off of it and be honest about it? Your purpose here is to force these trust companies into the Federal Reserve System. That is what you intend to do, and it will affect more or less the special privileges and franchises that these companies hold and enjoy, under which they have been doing business in many instances for more than half a century, some of them, and will affect the rights that they have already acquired and have long enjoyed under the laws of our State. I object to this. There is no necessity for it. The banks and trust companies in Pennsylvania have grown up side by side and are serving our people harmoniously and peacefully. Neither one of them is demanding this legislation. No national bank is here complaining that its rights are to be restricted or invaded. No trust company is here complaining that the national banks are impinging upon its rights or encroaching on its business. The situation has developed in my State to the entire satisfaction of all our financial institutions, gentlemen, and I ask you to think about it seriously before you force this legislation upon our banks and trust companies.

In some cases an ownership has developed by which the trust companies own the banks, and in other cases by which the banks own the trust companies. There is no quarrel among them. They act in harmony. One supplements the other, and in that great Commonwealth they transact the business of our people in perfect harmony and to the perfect satisfaction of all of their constituency. Now you are about to drag into this law a proposed amendment whereby you confer upon the national banks these extraordinary powers, under the guise of an amendment to the Federal banking law, which is an unnecessary and an unwise thing to do. Why do you not bring it in here as an amendment to the national banking law in such a way that it can be considered squarely on its own merits, and give us a chance to discuss it and consider it, instead of dragging it in here under a sort of subterfuge, as an amendment to the Federal reserve act, tied up with other amendments that may drag this vicious proposition through, for a purpose that is not fair and that is partially concealed? The real purpose of this provision is simply to force these trust companies into the Federal Reserve System willy-nilly, whether they wish it or not. I protest against it as unfair to the trust companies and financial interests of my State of Pennsylvania and as vicious and unnecessary legislation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not know that I care to use any more of my time.

Mr. PHELAN. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not want to use any more time, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that motion prevails, will that preclude the right to offer amendments?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there are any amendments pending in the bill they will be voted upon, but if no amendments are pending, and the previous question is ordered, no further amendments can be offered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was my desire to move to strike out section 2, which brings the trust companies within the scope of this bill. Will I be precluded from making that motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be precluded from offering an amendment to the bill except by a motion to recommit.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order for me to make that motion now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not after the gentleman has moved the previous question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order now to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he would permit a motion to be made to strike out section 2 before he insists on the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I admit that it is a little far-fetched.

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], having more time, would it be his privilege to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the purpose of offering an amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; for two reasons. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, having time for debate, can yield it for debate, but if he yields for an amendment he loses the floor. Another reason, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who had the floor, surrendered the balance of his time when the gentleman from Massachusetts took the floor and moved the previous question.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not yielded the floor, the ruling of the Chair would be that he could yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did not the Speaker—not the present occupant of the chair—but the Speaker of the House, during the earlier stages of the discussion of this bill, with the knowledge and approval of the gentleman from Massachusetts, say that there would be opportunity to offer amendments to the bill?

Mr. WINGO and Mr. GARNER. Regular order!

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-one Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, the Sergeant at Arms directed to notify the absentees, the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and sixty-six Members have answered to their names on this call, a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to order the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No amendments are pending. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit, and send the motion to the desk and ask to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania moves to recommit the bill H. R. 11283 to the Committee on Banking and Currency, with instructions to report the same forthwith with an amendment striking out section 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 28, noes 117.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. PHELAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAYMENT OF INCOME AND EXCESS-PROFITS TAXES.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue relative to permission to pay income and excess-profits taxes in advance. Some weeks ago I received a letter from the commissioner in which he set forth that such might be done, and I replied by saying that I had been informed that some revenue collectors had refused to accept partial payments—installment payments.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. In a moment. I wrote him to that effect, and I have a reply setting forth that the department on receipt of that letter had issued a circular letter to all internal-revenue collectors carrying instructions to accept partial payments. I ask unanimous consent to insert both the letter and the circular order in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I know personally of a case where a collector in an Indiana district refused to accept the payment of $12,500.

Mr. BARNHART. So do I, and that is the reason why I wrote the commissioner; and I have the reply saying that the revenue collectors have all been instructed to accept installment payments.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, it is not any favor to be permitted to pay in advance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All this debate is by unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I am reserving the right to object. What does the Commissioner of Internal Revenue say to the possibility of getting an opportunity afforded to people to be permitted to pay their taxes in installments after the date they become due?

Mr. BARNHART. I inquired about that by telephone, and the commissioner said that he had no legal authority to permit taxes to become delinquent; he could not do that; he could only act as directed by law; but he states that the excess-profits and the internal-revenue taxes may be paid in installments in advance just as we pay our local, State, and county taxes, all within the fiscal year, in two installments. At least we do that in Indiana, and I think you do in Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. No; we always pay in one sum.

Mr. BARNHART. You pay within the fiscal year, but the department says that unless there is some enactment to the contrary that the collectors have no alternative except to consider the taxes delinquent after the time fixed at the end of the fiscal year, which closes, as I understand, on the 1st of July.

Mr. MADDEN. As far as I have been able to ascertain, there is no disposition on the part of the Congress to embarrass the department, but I feel quite sure if the department would indicate that it has no objection to the division of the payment into quarterly or half yearly installments we would be able to get legislation.

Mr. BARNHART. That is what is indicated in this communication.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is not this a matter of great interest to all Members of the House? We have all been importuned to see if something can not be done about the paying by installment of the excess-profits taxes. I understand the gentleman makes the request that this letter be inserted in the RECORD. Is it not of sufficient interest to the membership of the House here present to have it read by the Clerk at this time rather than insert it in the RECORD?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the letter referred to relates only to the paying of present taxes in advance and not in deferred payments. I understand a letter has been addressed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] with respect to the matter of deferred payments.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask that the gentleman modify——

Mr. BLACK and Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, and the regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the letter indicated?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 22, 1918.

Hon. H. A. BARNHART,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BARNHART: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 17th instant, in which you make reference to a statement contained in a letter from this office that there will be no objection to making payment of income and excess-profits taxes by installments, provided such payment is made in advance. You state that you are receiving information that when partial payments are offered to collectors of internal revenue they are refused, and in view of the fact that you have advised taxpayers that installment payments will be accepted provided they are made in advance you wish to be advised what reply should be made to those taxpayers whose tenders of advance payments are refused by collectors.

In reply, you are informed that as soon as the attention of this office was called to the fact that collectors of internal revenue were refusing to accept advance payments of income and excess-profits taxes, a mimeographed letter (copy herewith) was addressed to collectors of internal revenue, which letter will, without doubt, result in the acceptance of all partial payments of taxes made in advance by taxpayers.

Sincerely, yours,

DANIEL C. ROPER, Commissioner.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, April 12, 1918.

To collectors of internal revenue:

It has come to the attention of this office that some collectors have been refusing to accept advance payments on income and excess-profits taxes from individuals and corporations when payment has been tendered subsequent to the filing of the return, but prior to the issuance of notice of assessment.

Collectors should accept, up to the due date of the tax, advance payments in whole or in part of the tax shown on the return. Of course, no discount is permissible on partial payments unless made in accordance with section 1009 of the act of October 3, 1917.

In this connection, special attention is called to article 40, Regulations No. 33, Revised, and the detailed instructions contained in T. D. 2622, amended by T. D.'s 2674 and 2695. Taxpayers have a right to take advantage of the discount at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, if payment is made in accordance with section 1009 and with the Treasury decisions referred to on or before May 15, 1918.

Proper record should be maintained of payments received under the above-named conditions in order that notation may be entered later on assessment lists upon their return from Washington.

Each notice of assessment hereafter sent to taxpayers will be accompanied by a copy of the attached form letter, in the hope that taxpayers will be encouraged to assist in relieving the congestion which will result on June 15.

DANIEL C. ROPER, Commissioner.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HOWARD was granted leave of absence for two days, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 25, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copies of communication from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission submitting deficiency estimates of appropriation required by the Interstate Commerce Commission (H. Doc. No. 1066); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Postmaster General submitting deficiency estimate of appropriation for the payment of indemnities, domestic mail, payable from postal revenue (H. Doc. No. 1067); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Acting Secretary of War submitting a claim for damages by river and harbor work adjusted and settled by the Chief of Engineers and approved by the Secretary of War (H. Doc. No. 1068); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. WHALEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2180) to approve mutual cession of territory by the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota and the consequent changes in the boundary line between said States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 510), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11243) providing for the establishment of the port of San Juan, customs district of Porto Rico, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 509), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. HUDDLESTON, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred sundry bills of the House, reported in lieu thereof the bill (H. R. 11658) granting pensions and increase of pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors, accompanied by a report (No. 511), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BESHLIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred sundry bills of the House, reported in lieu thereof the bill (H. R. 11663) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and to certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, accompanied by a report (No. 512), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11510) granting a pension to H. R. Dodd, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LITTLE: A bill (H. R. 11656) to remove all distinctions between members of the Regular Army, the National Army, and the National Guard in the service of the United States of America; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ROGERS: A bill (H. R. 11657) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved October 6, 1917; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. SIMS: A bill (H. R. 11659) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HASKELL: A bill (H. R. 11660) to provide one-half railroad fares to "persons in military service" upon all passenger trains of the railroads and systems of transportation in the possession, use, control, and operation of the United States Government; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 11661) to add certain lands to the Yellowstone National Park; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11662) donating to the town of Thermopolis, Wyo., two brass or bronze cannon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma: Resolution (H. Res. 322) requesting certain information from the Secretary of the Interior; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HUDDLESTON: A bill (H. R. 11658) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; to the Committee of the Whole House.

By Mr. BESHLIN: A bill (H. R. 11663) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; to the Committee of the Whole House.

By Mr. STINESS: Petition of 119 citizens of Rhode Island, favoring adequate punishment for spies and traitors in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TILSON: Petition of the Wallingford (Conn.) Central Labor Union, favoring the election of and recall of Federal judges by the people; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 25, 1918.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 24, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore assumed the chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Jones, Wash.	Nugent
Baird	France	Kirby	Overman
Bankhead	Gallinger	Lenroot	Page
Beckham	Gerry	Lodge	Poindexter
Brandegee	Gronna	McCumber	Pomerene

Fernald	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, Ga.

Smoot	Thomas	Underwood	Williams
Sterling	Thompson	Vardaman	Wolcott
Sutherland	Tillman	Wadsworth
Swanson	Trammell	Walsh

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is absent in the liberty-loan campaign. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], is detained in the liberty-loan campaign. I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness, and that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

LIBERTY-LOAN PARADE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senate, the Chair will lay before the Senate a communication regarding the liberty-loan parade, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

LIBERTY LOAN COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President of the United States,
The Capitol, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: Pursuant to the proclamation of President Wilson the citizens of Washington will observe Liberty Day next Friday afternoon with a liberty bond buyers' parade, which will leave the Peace Monument at 2 o'clock sharp.

This will be a parade of all men and women in Washington who have bought liberty bonds of the third issue.

As chairman of the liberty bond buyers' parade committee, I am directed to extend an invitation to you and the Members and employees of the Senate to take part in this practical demonstration of interest in the boys "over there."

I am sure that the participation of the Members of the Senate in this demonstration would be a marked example to the country.

Kindly have this invitation placed before the Senate at its meeting to-morrow, Monday, as the time is short.

Yours, very truly,

CHAS. J. COLUMBUS,
Chairman Liberty Bond Buyers' Committee.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, in order that Senators and the officers and employees of the Senate may have an opportunity to participate in the liberty-loan parade, which commences at 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon, I move that to-morrow at 1.30 o'clock p. m. the Senate shall stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon the following day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LABOR CONDITIONS ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, in the past few days there has been some discussion in the Senate about the Mooney case in San Francisco. I have taken no part in that discussion; I have not investigated the matter and have no opinion as to whether Mr. Mooney was fairly convicted or not; but in view of what has been said about the attempt to create a strike on account of the Mooney case, I desire to place in the RECORD a statement issued by Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in which he vigorously condemns any effort to incite strikes in connection with the Mooney case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The communication is as follows:

STATEMENT ISSUED BY SAMUEL GOMPERS, PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 22, 1918.

The machinations of the prosecution in the Mooney trial justifies the judgment that he was found guilty on perjured evidence; it is greatly regrettable that the California courts refused to consider this claim which was discovered since the trial. Every legal action has been and will be taken by the bona fide labor movement of the United States to secure justice for Mooney. Any attempt to incite a strike of the workers of a trade or industry of a locality, State, or of the Nation, is not only violative of the laws of the national and international unions of America but is repugnant to the rights and the interests of the workers themselves. Such an attempt either to incite or order a local or general strike is unjustifiable and dangerously prejudicial to the lives of our sons and brothers fighting in France for the safety of the homes, freedom, and democracy the world over. In addition, such an agitation as has been inaugurated can only react against Mooney.

Men of labor, let us, with all fair-minded citizens, endeavor to secure justice for Mooney, but let us put forth our efforts on a line that will insure commendation, not condemnation coupled with failure.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 11020. An act to amend and reenact sections 5136, 5137, 5139, 5147, 5172, 5222, and 5230 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

H. R. 11283. An act to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 3476) to authorize the extension of a spur track or siding from the existing lines of railroad in the District of Columbia across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the buildings occupied by the field medical supply depot of the Army, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

TRENTINO REFUGEES IN ITALY.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, at the outbreak of this war FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA, a brilliant young lawyer of Italian parentage and a Representative in Congress from New York City, offered his services to the War Department. He was commissioned a captain in the United States Army, and since October 1 has served in an aero squadron in Italy. Because of his familiarity with the Italian language, he has often been called upon by our ambassador in Italy to speak at many Italian affairs of importance, notably the Italian Parliament, representing the ambassador and our Government. Recently in Milan, after speaking at an immense mass meeting in that city, he was approached by a committee representing the Trentino refugees, who submitted to him a petition setting forth some of their troubles. He has sent this petition to me—I received it in this morning's mail—and I ask unanimous consent that Capt. LAGUARDIA's letter and the petition be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CAMP OVEST, FOGGIA, ITALY, March 20, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM CALDER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I inclose herewith copy of translation of a letter which was handed to me by a committee of Trentino refugees at Milan after I had addressed a meeting held under the auspices of the Parliamentary Union at the Scala Theater of that city. I was so impressed with the sincerity and the determination of these unfortunate people that I deemed it worthy of transmitting to you.

Sincerely,

F. LAGUARDIA.

[Commission of Emigration, Trentino. Organized by virtue of the prefectoral decree of Apr. 12, 1916, and approved by Royal decree July 25, 1916. No. 1142.]

MILAN, February 4, 1918.

To the Hon. Mr. LAGUARDIA,
Member of the American Congress:

The Trentino refugees in Italy no longer have here their former representatives.

The deputy from Trent, Cesare Battisti, after having preached the necessity of the war in all Italian cities, was made a prisoner while fighting and was hung by the Austrians.

The deputies from Rovereto and from the Trentino Valleys, the mayors and the local authorities, the influential men, are in Austria, either under sentence or interned. They had not fled, believing it their duty to await at their posts the prompt arrival of the liberating army.

At present, therefore, the Trentino refugees in Italy are forming for themselves a vast association, which will unite them all, so that with full authority can be made known to the allies the Italianism and the right of Trentino to become united to Italy and saved from destruction.

In the meantime the Trentino commission of emigration is speaking in their name.

We want the allies all to know that Trentino is a country completely Italian in race, in language, in customs, and that among this solid mass there is not 1 per cent of Teuton; that she has clung desperately to her language; and that her peoples have stood against German violence and German deceit, but that the war has exhausted and destroyed all her material, if not yet her moral forces; and that should she be compelled to remain Austrian we would be irremediably obliterated by the renewed exasperated preponderance of our enemies, the Germans; that they have already confiscated our land and our property; they have deported more than a hundred thousand persons from their country, to their ruin or death.

Trentino is of no value to Austria other than as an arm for dominating Italy; on the other hand, Italy can never live freely with such a wedge in her heart. We are an honest little people, trampled on and crushed, massacred, and dispersed, but who do not wish to perish.

We do not wish to perish, and therefore we must be rescued from Austrian—that is, German—power. We have proclaimed all this loudly and in the face of danger. There is no need of a new plebiscite. This would be to-day a nasty derision.

It has been proclaimed by our deputies elected by universal suffrage. They are dead, incarcerated, or interned, and thir voices to-day are stifled. It has been proclaimed by our mayors and our chiefs, including the clergy and the bishop who shared the same fate. It has been proclaimed by the thousands of citizens condemned for high treason and whose property was confiscated; our prisoners who came from Russia, about 2,000, while many thousands have demanded it who are now in part, perhaps, arriving in America from Siberia; all the deported ones have demanded it, but above all our volunteers, who have no voice but who with the ready offer of their lives cry out to the world the will and the needs of Trentino.

All of this we want to say and to prove to the allies, and especially to America and to her great President.

We do not presume to think that our words and our grief can influence the decisions of your country, but since Mr. Wilson, in one of the most noble programs known to history, has solemnly proclaimed the right of small, oppressed nationalities to live, we want America to know that if there is a little, oppressed people menaced with destruction, solidly Italian, necessary to complete and assure the independence of Italy it is Trentino; that she looks with firm faith to the great American Nation, which proclaims and sustains to-day the rights of peoples as France and America once proclaimed and sustained the rights of the individual, and that she will not withdraw until final and complete victory.

We present these considerations to you personally, trusting that, conforming to your very noble and categorical affirmations for final victory expressed by you, and trusting also to the warm sympathy of America for our country, you will cause to be heard the sorrowful but proud voice of Trentino, ready for every sacrifice, however great, for the triumph of her legitimate and sacred revindication.

CARLO ESTERLE.
FRANCO CHIVELLI.
GINO MARZANI.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4437) to amend section 11 (a), title 1, Part II, of the act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes, approved September 8, 1916; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 4438) for the relief of Duchesne and Uinta school districts, in the State of Utah; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 4439) to provide for the survey of a national highway connecting certain national monuments in the States of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 4440) to authorize the judges of the United States Court of Customs Appeals to be assigned to any district or circuit court of appeals of the United States, and conferring the jurisdiction of said courts upon them while so assigned; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 4441) granting a pension to Charles Edwards (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4442) granting an increase of pension to Louisa Schenk (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4443) granting a pension to Elizabeth Rider (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 4444) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TILLMAN:

A bill (S. 4445) granting the consent of Congress to Marion and Horry Counties, S. C., to construct a bridge across Little Peedee River; to the Committee on Commerce.

INDIAN GRAZING LANDS IN UTAH.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 232), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas in the counties of Duchesne and Uinta, in the State of Utah, there is a large body of Indian lands known as Indian grazing lands, which has not been allotted in severalty to the Indians of the Ute Tribe, which lands adjoin the Ashley National Forest in the State of Utah; and

Whereas said lands are valuable for grazing purposes and contain areas which are also specially adapted to agricultural use and occupation; and

Whereas said lands are not being utilized for any beneficial purpose and are excluded from the use of the white settlers in said counties; and

Whereas the said Indians, for whose use said lands have ostensibly been set apart, are unable to occupy or make any economic or beneficial use of the same; and

Whereas said Indians, for whose use said lands have been segregated and set apart, are not making an economic or adequate use of said lands, and will not in the future be able to make an economic or adequate use of said lands: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate the present status of the said so-called Indian grazing lands in Duchesne and Uinta Counties, Utah, and what means may be taken to extinguish the Indian title to said lands and open the same to use, settlement, and occupation, and whether it is convenient and advantageous to add said lands, or any part thereof, to the Uinta National Forest.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On April 22, 1918:

S. 3388. An act to amend the emergency shipping fund provisions of the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 15, 1917, so as to empower the President and his designated agents to take over certain transportation systems for the transportation of shipyard and plant employees, and for other purposes.

On April 23, 1918:

S. 4292. An act to conserve the gold supply of the United States; to permit the settlement in silver of trade balances adverse to the United States; to provide silver for subsidiary coinage and for commercial use; to assist foreign governments at war with the enemies of the United States; and for the above purposes to stabilize the price and encourage the production of silver.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

H. R. 11020. An act to amend and reenact sections 5136, 5137, 5139, 5147, 5172, 5222, and 5230 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

H. R. 11283. An act to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the last amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary which was passed over, and is to be found on page 2, line 23, after the word "executive" to insert the words "or administrative."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not occupied any time in the discussion of this bill, and for that reason I feel justified in taking a very few minutes to discuss a matter which is somewhat foreign to the amendment that has been submitted, but which nevertheless has an indirect bearing upon the legislation which is now under consideration.

In a recent issue of the Manchester (N. H.) Mirror, a widely read Republican newspaper, under the caption "Congressional slacking," appears the following editorial, which I ask to have read from the desk, after which I will occupy a few minutes in pointing out its glaring inaccuracies. I ask that the article may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The conduct of our national law makers for the last few months has justified the accusation that of all the important war factors in the United States Congress is the only one that has not yet put itself on a war basis.

Congressional methods were never anything to brag about in times of piping peace.

When Congress continues to function on the same old ineffective plane in the midst of the world's supreme crisis, it becomes intolerable.

A Massachusetts Congressman not long ago got up in meeting and told his colleagues what he thought of their frittering away of precious time, their loafing in committee rooms, their endless postponements, their political scheming, their elaborate faultfinding with other departments of Government while neglecting constructive action of their own and refusing to pass bills imperatively needed for the prosecution of the war.

After that speech the House spent two whole days in vocal condemnation of the offending Member.

And nearly every other Member must have known, nevertheless, that most of his strictures were true.

Washington correspondents say that the law makers among themselves frankly recognize their failure so far in this session, and even "laugh and joke about it," that their pose of injured dignity under criticism is for public effect.

However that may be, the record thus far is a shameful one.

Congress neglected to pass legislation enabling the Government to issue its third liberty loan until the Secretary of the Treasury, in despair, only a few days before the date for opening the loan, forced its hand by arranging and publishing the terms and conditions of the loan without authority.

Congress has persistently refused to do anything about the second Army draft until time for starting it has passed, and the War Department has been compelled to inaugurate it by makeshift methods.

Measures meant to give the executive department needed authority for departmental reorganization have dragged along interminably.

Appointments have been held up.

Imperative appropriation bills have not been passed.

Laws for dealing adequately with spies and traitors are still lacking.

It has almost seemed, at times, that Congress has stopped functioning.

There are some signs of improvement now, due possibly to the fact that the menace of the big German drive has penetrated to some congressional minds not hitherto awakened.

There is room for much more improvement.

And if it doesn't appear soon, the country will deal very drastically, in the fall elections, with numerous Congressmen of both parties.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have examined the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in connection with the matter which the editor of that paper makes the statement that two days were consumed in the other House in debating something connected with a Member of that body, and I discover that one hour was occupied by a Member of the House in a speech which he made, and that was the amount of time which was consumed. There is quite a difference between one hour and two days.

As to the liberty loan, it is perfectly well known to every Member of this body that the arrangements were not made for launching that loan until the time arrived when it was launched, because of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury was undecided in his own mind what rate of interest the bonds should bear. Hence, Congress was not in any way responsible for a delay in that matter, and the loan could not have been launched any sooner than it was under the circumstances which then existed.

Mr. President, at the present session of Congress there have been passed and approved by the President 58 public laws and resolutions, 36 of which are essentially war measures, and the others bear a close relation to the war.

Two other war bills are now in the hands of the President awaiting his signature, and there are in conference, and will soon be enacted, four other purely war measures.

In addition to the above, each House has passed a number of war bills that are now under consideration by the other House, and which will doubtless soon become laws.

Regarding the matter of appropriations, concerning which the newspaper editorial finds fault, the facts are that both Houses have acted on appropriation bills, as follows: The Agricultural appropriation bill, carrying $28,291,283; the Indian appropriation bill, carrying $11,119,850; and the legislative appropriation bill, carrying $70,023,965.75, all of which are now in conference. The Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, carrying $7,937,376.66; the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, carrying $5,356,666,016.93; and the further urgent deficiency bill, carrying $731,901,789.46, have become laws. The total amount appropriated by those measures is $6,205,940,281.80, to which may be added very large amounts carried in general legislative bills, such as $50,000,000 for the Shipping Board housing bill, and another bill that has passed the House and is now under consideration by the Senate, which will doubtless be passed in a few days, makes a further appropriation of $60,000,000 for housing purposes, and it is understood that another deficiency bill will soon be acted on.

Mr. President, the plain, palpable truth is that the number of important measures already enacted into law, designed to strengthen the hands of the President in the vigorous prosecution of the war, for all of which bills I have voted, should satisfy every reasonable man that Congress has done its full duty, and it greatly surprises me that so influential and careful a newspaper as the Manchester Mirror should join in the cry that Congress is culpably negligent in the matter of war legislation—an assertion that the record absolutely disproves. If there is any "slacking" in the prosecution of the war, it is not in Congress, and this foolish charge, iterated and reiterated in the press, should be stopped, and the blame placed at the door of those responsible for whatever delays or mismanagement may exist.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator if a single department has had to wait one minute for money necessary to carry on this war?

Mr. GALLINGER. So far as I have observed, and as a Member of the Committee on Appropriations I have looked into that matter somewhat, the question the Senator asks answers itself. No department has had to wait. On the contrary, more money has been appropriated than has been used, and no interest is suffering because of the lack of prompt action on the part of Congress in the matter of appropriations.

Mr. GALLINGER subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day I made some brief observations on the appropriations made during the present session. I have in my hand an address delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on October 11, 1917, before the Massachusetts Historical Society, entitled "Recent Congressional Legislation," which deals with matters of that kind. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address referred to is as follows:

[Address of Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE before the Massachusetts Historical Society, October 11, 1917.]

RECENT CONGRESSIONAL LEGISLATION.

"I have not had the pleasure and satisfaction of presiding over a meeting of the society since last November. This enforced absence, however, has been my misfortune and not my fault. I have been the victim of circumstances. But I have felt that after this long interval, if I could have the indulgence of the society, I should like to say something in regard to the events of the past year. That period has been signalized by one of the greatest events of modern history and it has been a year crowded with great events. I refer, of course, to the entrance of the United States into the world war. When Canning uttered his famous declaration in the House of Commons, that he would call in the New World to redress the balance of the old, he little thought how that declaration would be carried out. We have entered the war and we are now engaged in the great effort to redress the balance of the Old World.

"I am going to say a few words about what led up to this momentous action on the part of the United States and what has been done since. It will be remembered that the last election turned and was decided upon the assertion that the President had kept the peace, and that he would continue to keep the peace. Many Democrats, I think, voted for the Republican candidate, but many more Republicans voted for Mr. Wilson on the sole ground that he had kept the peace, and although the margins in many States were narrow the result was decisive.

"The President, on the 18th of December, almost immediately after the assembling of Congress, sent to the powers, the other nations of the world, what was known as the 'peace note,' which seemed to be the logical deduction from the election which had just taken place. It so chanced that the note appeared almost simultaneously with Germany's first attempt to bring about some sort of German peace, an unlucky coincidence. The President followed up his note by an address to the Senate in favor of a league for peace, what might be called a peace plan. That was on January 22, 1917. Both the peace note and the peace plan brought forth much criticism and caused but little satisfaction here. It is not, therefore, without interest in this connection to consider for a moment their reception in Germany which does not seem to have accorded entirely with the enthusiasm of Count Bernstorff, who in a New York newspaper compared the President's note to the Star of Bethlehem.

"There has just been published a book entitled 'My Four Years in Germany,' by Mr. Gerard, which is very interesting and very instructive as to the effect of the President's position in the winter of 1916–1917 upon German opinion. It appears from Mr. Gerard's book that all the leading members of the Government as well as the German press—and I suppose Germans generally, although that does not matter—all felt that after the election carried upon the peace issue, and after the President's peace note, there was no possibility of the United States going into the war; that neither the President could advise war nor that the people would follow him into war if he should advise it. They were also dissatisfied with the "peace plan" because it was not in every respect as consonant with German plans and as thoroughly friendly to Germany as they expected and desired it to be.

"This attitude of the German mind is an interesting illustration of the point at which the Germans have been curiously inefficient—their utter failure to form any just judgment of the psychology of other nations. They were perfectly confident that England would not come into the war. They believed England to be on the verge of civil war, and it broke on them with a shock of tremendous surprise when England went unitedly into the war upon the invasion of Belgium. We learn from Mr. Gerard's book that a similar surprise was occasioned in Germany when we acted and went to war with practical unanimity.

"I do not think that the fact of this German belief in our determination to have peace at any price was decisive of their action; I believe that they would have taken the same action in any event, but they were nevertheless proceeding upon that belief. They followed up the President's plan for peace by declaring a new submarine zone, and stated in their note to us that we could send one ship, painted as nearly as one could make out like a barber's pole, once a week to some given port, but that with this insulting exception they were going to make the new submarine campaign ruthless and all destructive. The chancellor stated that this new campaign had been delayed merely because they were waiting until they had completed a sufficient number of submarines. Perhaps you may not all realize just what that statement meant. It meant that the assurances which they had given to this country after the Sussex incident were absolutely false and that every note they wrote was false, and that they knew them to be false and meant them to be so; that they had no idea of carrying out any one of those assurances. Therefore, when they issued their declaration of the new zone they, of course, broke all the assurances which they had given this country, and thereupon the President severed relations with Germany on the 3d of February, 1917.

"The Congress was then drawing toward its last days. It was a period of very deep anxiety and very severe strain, because it was not at all clear what we were going to do. The President asked for authority from Congress to arm merchantmen. A bill for that purpose passed the House and came to the Senate in the closing days of February. It was reported unanimously from the Foreign Relations Committee, but in the Senate a resistance in the form of parliamentary obstruction developed on the part of a small group of Senators, who have since, with a few exceptions, been resisting or seeking to injure directly or indirectly all war legislation. Owing to the fact that we were in the last day of the session the cloture could not be applied; there was not time for it, and there was, therefore, no method of giving the President by law the authority asked for. I was inclined myself to agree with him that he could have armed the merchantmen without specific authority from Congress. The importance of congressional action, it seemed to me then, was that in this way we gave the crews of merchantmen and all men on board a military status and took them out of the possibility of being treated as pirates. There was a defect in our existing laws which ought to have been covered. But however that may be, the bill failed and Congress adjourned.

"The President at first was inclined not to call the new Congress until the last possible moment. There were three large regular appropriation bills which went over, and this made it necessary in any event to summon Congress before the end of the fiscal year, which was June 30. But overt acts continued to be committed by the German Government, and on the 21st of March the President called Congress in extraordinary session. Congress convened on the 2d of April and the President came before the Houses that same evening and delivered the message which all the world read, a most admirable message and a very powerful statement of the American case. Four days later Congress passed the war resolution declaring that a state of war existed with Germany, and it was at once signed by the President.

"As I have been to a certain extent a participant in what has happened since that time, I thought that the society would permit me to call attention to the conditions we in Congress were obliged to meet and to what we have done. You see reports from day to day in the newspapers, but perhaps the facts have not been all brought to your attention in a single statement.

"It is to be remembered, in the first place, that we were practically wholly unprepared. There was a strong movement for preparation immediately after the war in Europe opened in 1914. At that time the President discountenanced the movement and referred to those who were urging preparation as nervous and excited. A year later he had changed his mind, and he made, as you all recall, a tour through the country strongly urging preparation. The Secretary of War had a plan for increasing the Regular Army, having what he termed a "continental army" as a reserve, of 400,000 men, and also for making large expenditures for munitions. Unfortunately, the chairman of the House Military Committee, Mr. Hay, of Virginia, who has since been made a judge, had held that position for many years and had always resisted doing anything for the proper increase of the Regular Army. He, too, had a characteristic plan which really did nothing, and the President accepted Mr. Hay's plan. This resulted in the retirement of Mr. Garrison from the Cabinet. I think that I am speaking within bounds when I say that Mr. Hay by his policy did more injury to this country at a great crisis than any one man I have ever known of in either branch of Congress. Therefore, when war was declared two precious years had been wasted and practically nothing done in the way of preparation for the Army. Even the Regular Army appropriation bill for this year had not been passed on March 4. It was one of the bills which had gone over.

"The Navy fared better. The chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs is Mr. PADGETT, of Tennessee; he has been for many years chairman of that committee, has a remarkable knowledge of everything connected with the Navy, and is a very wise and liberal-minded man. Mr. PADGETT in 1916 prepared a bill which had in it a good deal of legislation in addition to the appropriations, and in due course it came over to the Senate. It so happened that I was one of the subcommittee of two to whom the bill was referred, and as the full committee adopted the bill without a change, and as the Senate subsequently adopted the committee bill without a change, I think I may say that Senator SWANSON, of Virginia, who, owing to the illness of Senator TILLMAN, was the acting chairman of the committee, and to whom the country owes a great debt, and I really framed the Senate amendments, 250 in number. I mention this merely because I am trying to show what happened to the Navy and what a benefit even this one year of preparation proved to be.

"The naval bill of 1916 was really a great legislative measure with incidental appropriations. We legislated for the Naval Reserve; we created the Naval Militia; we provided for taking over in time of war the Revenue-Cutter Service and the Coast Survey Service. We revised the law in regard to the personnel of the Navy, regulating promotions, and a vast mass of other detail legislation, all making for the preparation of the Navy. We appropriated $313,000,000, covering the largest program ever made in this country, and as large, I think, as has ever been made in almost any country for a single year, and it seemed at that moment a very large amount. To-day it seems very moderate.

"That bill passed in August, 1916. Last winter we passed another naval bill with comparatively little legislation in it, for not much was needed, but we increased the appropriations. We gave the President $150,000,000 for the purchase of submarine chasers and patrol boats and to expedite the building of vessels already contracted for, and we made further large authorizations. This bill appropriated over $500,000,000. It was the 3d of March when that bill became law, only a month before war was declared. The other bill was passed less than a year before. Yet the fact that even this amount of preparation had been made has been of inestimable value. And if you will pause a moment to think you will recall how little has been said about preparation in the Navy since the war began and comparatively little money voted—I say comparatively—a good many hundred millions have been added, but comparatively it has been little. The Navy was able to move at once. Before April had expired we had destroyers on the coast of Ireland, and we have been adding to them steadily, until now we have a very formidable fleet of that character on the other side of the water.

"There has been a great deal done in Congress in addition to this. Great powers have been granted to the President, necessary powers, as I think, wisely granted, as I hope. We have created a Shipping Board with enormous powers and enormous appropriations, which is taking over practically all the shipping of the United States. We were very unfortunate in the man who was first made chairman of that board—Mr. Denman, of California. I do not need to go into details; it is enough to say that his operations in the board caused a delay of something like five months, and instead of beginning to get vessels early next spring we shall be lucky if we get any by next July.

"We also established a Food Commission and a Coal Commission, and they are engaged in an experiment which is to me of immense interest. History tends to show that all attempts at price fixing have been failures, but we are now attempting to lower prices—not only to fix prices but to lower prices except labor prices and costs—and at the same time to stimulate production, increase confidence, reduce profits, and place huge loans. I am anxious to see how well it works. It is an ambitious program. If it works successfully it will be a great benefit, but I venture to think that there are risks and uncertainties connected with it.

"We have also a commission on railroad transportation to determine priority of shipments.

"The part of all this work with which I came in closest contact was that which fell upon Congress, the work which Congress was called upon to do and which could be done only by Congress. Congress has its defects; nobody is more aware of them than I, but sometimes it is without reason made a packhorse for every fault that can be found or imagined. The newspapers steadily charged Congress with intolerable delay and that we were wasting time in discussions. The best answer to this charge is to state what Congress actually has accomplished. I might say in addition that Mr. Balfour and the heads of other missions who were here spoke not only in praise but with wonder at the amount that was accomplished in Congress; and the newspapers, I think, in getting impatient of debate, hardly stopped to consider that we could not pass and ought not to have passed without discussion bills which entirely revolutionized what we are pleased to call our constitutional privileges and rights, and that it was inevitable and proper that there should be some discussion about them. Delays, grievous delays, there have been but not in the legislative branch of the Government.

"Now, as to this question of congressional delay. I shall not take long, but I think it may interest the society to know what the Congress has actually done since the declaration of war on the 6th day of April. We first passed a general deficiency appropriation act appropriating $$163,000,000$, of which $$100,000,000$ was for national security and defense and for each and every purpose connected with the war.

"We passed an act authorizing the issue of bonds to meet measures for national security. This act appropriated $$3,000,000,000$ for establishing credits for foreign governments and $$2,000,000,000$ to meet domestic expenditures, and a certain additional amount to consolidate and take up some small outstanding loans.

"We passed an act giving an additional midshipman to each Senator and each congressional district.

"We passed the regular appropriation act carrying $$223,000,000$ for the support of the Army for the regular fiscal year.

"We passed an act authorizing the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States—this was the act which authorized the selective draft of a million men—and there was a great deal of subsidiary legislation connected with it. Members will recall that it took England and Canada some three years to pass conscription acts.

"We passed a resolution authorizing the President to take over for the United States shipping owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war. This covered the German vessels, something over 500,000 tons. They are now all in the service, practically, and serving as transports for our troops.

"We passed an act to increase the commission and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy from 87,000 to 150,000 men and of the Marine Corps from 17,000 to 30,000.

"We passed the regular act making appropriations for the Military Academy.

"We passed an act amending the war-risk insurance act; and then the regular act appropriating $$147,000,000$ for the sundry civil expenses.

"We passed the deficiency bill appropriating $$3,281,000,000$ for the Military and Naval Establishments, and this act appropriated, among other things, $$405,000,000$ for an emergency shipping fund.

"We passed an act to punish acts of interference with foreign relations known as the espionage bill. It contained really 12 different bills which had been introduced on these subjects, consolidated into one measure.

"We passed an act—I am leaving out many small ones—we passed an act appropriating $$640,000,000$ to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, prepare, and operate airships; and also an act in connection with it authorizing the United States to take possession of a site for a permanent aviation station.

"We passed the river and harbor bill, carrying $$27,000,000$, which looks very moderate at this time.

"We passed an act enlarging the Interstate Commerce Commission;

"An act appropriating $$11,346,400$ to stimulate food production;

"An act known as the food and fuel act, appropriating $$162,500,000$ for the conservation of food products and fuel;

"An act to authorize an additional issue of war bonds. This is the second bond issue, under which the present loan is being made. This act makes an additional appropriation of $$4,000,000,000$ to extend credit in the United States to our allies and for the expenses incident to the preparation and issue of bonds and certificates; and it authorizes an additional issue of $$3,000,000,000$ of bonds to meet the loans to foreign governments—that covers the $$3,000,000,000$ of the first act—and an additional issue of one-year certificates of indebtedness beyond the $$2,000,000,000$ and an issue of five-year war-saving certificates, making $$5,000,000,000$, carrying all together $$7,000,000,000$ of new loans.

"We have just passed an act appropriating $$5,650,000,000$ to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the fiscal year 1918. This is the largest appropriation act ever passed by this or any other country.

"We passed an act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, which appropriates $$450,000$. That is the 'trading with the enemy act,' a very important act.

"We passed an act to provide revenues to defray war expenses, and for other purposes. This provides approximately $$2,500,000,000$ of revenue to defray the expense of Government. That is the tax bill, of which I shall say a word presently.

"We passed an act to provide a military and naval family allowance, compensation and insurance fund, known as the soldiers' insurance act.

"Finally, a further act authorizing the Shipping Board to license the use of vessels of foreign registry and construction for the coastwise trade for the period of the war and 120 days thereafter.

"I think this is a very remarkable list of measures which have been passed in six months. The bill which caused the greatest difficulty and consumed the most time was the revenue bill. Bills to spend money and bills to borrow money reaching into the billions passed in a few days and sometimes in a few hours. There was no opposition to either spending or borrowing in Congress or in the country so far as we could see. But when it came to imposing taxes the scene changed and cheerfulness and unanimity disappeared. The bill came over from the House on the 25th of May, and the Committee on Finance, of which I happened to be a member, had that bill for over two months in committee, meeting every day for six or seven hours a day—literally every day. We then had three weeks of debate in the Senate, where there were differences of opinion which had not appeared before on the bond bills and the appropriation bills, and it then went to conference, where it remained for nearly three weeks, and which was the most disagreeable part of the whole business. The House appeared to be obstinate; the Senate, of course, was firm. The result was a great deal of debate, which filled whole days for three weeks, including Sundays. The result is that we have now imposed upon this country for the fiscal year 1917, including the taxes already imposed by existing law, between $$3,800,000,000$ and $$4,000,000,000$, a larger sum to take from a people in taxation than has ever been attempted by any nation in the world. I was one of those who thought that we went too far; that we went beyond the line of safety in the taxation of profits and of incomes; and I am afraid we have done so, but we had great difficulty in holding the rates at the figures established by the committee. To give you an idea of what these taxes amount to, the percentage of expenditures to be raised by direct taxation is 36.02 per cent. The highest proportion of taxes to loans in providing for expenditures in time of war was in the last year of our Civil War, when we raised as much as 30 per cent of the expenditures by taxation. We are now raising 36.02 per cent, and the percentage to be met by Government obligations is 63.98 per cent. The percentages raised by direct taxation by other countries involved in the present war after three years of war are:

	Per cent.
England	26
France	14.12
Germany	14⅞
Canada	8

"It is, of course, sound finance to take a large proportion of the expenditures from taxation, but this principle can easily be carried too far, can in fact be made ruinous. And what a strong element in Congress were disposed to overlook was the fact that it was essential to our financial stability and success to keep business as productive and active as possible. For that purpose you must have a certain surplus, so that business can extend and maintain itself. You also must look to that same surplus for all your loans. There was nothing else to do, nowhere else to go for money. When I tell you that it required a great effort and a strong contest in the Senate to defeat a proposition to put a tax of 76 per cent flat on all profits, war profits and peace profits alike, you can see that we have not been as excessive as some people desired, because there were Members of both House and Senate who thought this was an excellent time to seize upon 'criminal wealth.'

"Men, munitions, and money are the essential things. We have the money; the munitions, I am sorry to say, are only beginning to come in. I will give you one example which will give you an idea of what lack of preparation means. The departments came in on the 2d day of July and furnished us their estimates for the coming year—$$5,563,000,000$—and we passed our original revenue bill, which was confined to war profits, on those figures. Twenty days later the heads of departments came in with additional estimates for appropriations reaching nearly six billions. When the last appropriation bill had passed, between the time that it came to the Senate and while the Senate committee had it under consideration for a report, they brought in $$700,000,000$ additional estimate. One item let me speak of as an illustration. We had been told in past years that we were well off in field artillery. They came before us—Gen. Crozier, the head of the Ordnance Department, and others—came before us when these great estimates came in—additional estimates—and informed us that for an army of a million men we needed 16,000 pieces of field artillery, the bulk of them 3s which correspond to the French 75s; but all kinds, including mortars and up to as heavy as 9-inch guns, which would take a year to make. We actually had 600 pieces of field artillery, only enough to train our troops here, and when war was declared no shells to speak of.

"Of course, this lack of preparedness has increased the expenditure enormously, because everything has to be done in such haste and in the most expensive way, but still, slowly with much stumbling and confusion, it is being done.

"I thought perhaps these figures—although figures are dry—might be of interest as a contemporary historical record in our proceedings.

"Before concluding, I wish to say one word about the situation as it appears to us in Washington. It is the intention of the President and the administration at this time, I know, to carry this war through; and that is the intention of the overwhelming majority in Congress; the settled purpose of many who were very reluctant to go to war as well as of many who thought we ought to have gone to war long before the time when we did. The Government, Congress, and President mean to carry the war through. Yet we see the newspapers filled with talk about peace, which all comes directly or indirectly from the enemy; it either emanates from Germany or is accidentally very like what the Germans are suggesting. We have had a note from the Pope, we have had resolutions in Congress, and we have had a great deal of general irresponsible talk about peace. This talk all proceeds, with slight variations, on the basis of the status quo ante bellum. To my mind—and I know this is the view of the administration—every man—the President, who delivered the war message, and Congress, who voted for war—would be guilty of the blackest of crimes if they were willing to make a peace on the status quo ante bellum and recreate the situation which existed before the war. If we send our armies and our young men abroad to be killed and wounded in northern France and in Flanders with no result but this, our entrance into war with such an intention was a crime which nothing can justify. The intent of Congress and the intent of the President, which I saw he reiterated only day before yesterday, was that there could be no peace until we could create a situation where no such war as this could recur. To make peace on the basis of the status quo ante bellum simply means that Germany will have a breathing space and the whole horror will come over again, with the chance that we shall not be all united as we are now. We must have peace and victory; complete victory; no other will stand or be worth having.

"The President in his letter to the Pope stated what is the absolute truth—that we have no one now we can negotiate with. We can not negotiate with a government which has declared that treaties are scraps of paper to be torn up when it feels like it. We can not make peace in the ordinary way. We can not in the first place make peace, except in company with our allies. There may be no written conventions or treaties, but it would brand us with everlasting dishonor and bring ruin to us also if we undertook to make a separate peace. Therefore there is only one alternative, and that is to bring Germany to her knees and force upon her a peace which we shall dictate and which will make the world safe—not merely safe for democracy, but safe for all the allied free countries to pursue their own way in security and work out their own salvation.

"If we had not gone into this war and Germany had won it we should have been the next victim and we should have been compelled to fight alone. We must win the war, we shall win this war. Of the final result I have no sort of doubt. But the feeling in Congress—I mean of the great majority of both Houses—is that any peace at all at this time or any argument for peace at this moment is little short of hostility to the United States and is distinctly helpful to Germany. Those charged with the responsibility of Government feel very strongly that the hour has not come for talk, idle talk about peace on German terms. I am sure that such is the feeling of the administration—as sure as I can be of anything which has been directly told to me. This is the situation in which the country stands to-day; this is the legislation which Congress has passed.

"I have taken much more time than I intended, but I trust the society will not think the hour misspent. I shall take the liberty of adding a financial statement by Senator SMOOT, of Utah, the highest and most careful authority on this subject in the Senate.

APPROPRIATIONS, ESTIMATED RECEIPTS, ETC.

[Statement prepared by Senator SMOOT.]

The direct appropriations made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, total	$18,879,177,014.96
There have been contracts authorized by acts of Congress, in addition to direct appropriations, to be met by future appropriations by Congress amounting to	2,511,553,925.50
Included in the direct appropriations are the following items that will not be paid out of the appropriations authorized and for advances to foreign countries, which will be paid back to our Government with interest:
The first war-risk insurance act, later repealed	$10,000,000.00
The sinking fund never set aside	60,000,000.00
Loans to foreign countries	7,000,000,000.00
Interest on loans to foreign countries	170,000,000.00
Total	7,240,000,000.00
Appropriations made	18,879,177,014.96
Deductions not direct payments for Government expenses	7,240,000,000.00
Actual Government expenses for year appropriated for	11,639,177,014.96
Revenues to be raised under existing laws:
From acts in force before this present extra session of Congress	1,333,500,000.00
From the revenue act passed this session	2,534,870,000.00
From post-office receipts (provision for expenses of the Post Office Department is included in the annual appropriations)	325,000,000.00
Total revenue	4,193,370,000.00
Appropriations for expenses of the Government	11,639,177,014.96
Revenues of the Government	4,193,370,000.00
Balance to be provided for	7,445,807,014.96
The act of Sept. 24, 1917, authorizes an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures of the Government of	3,538,945,460.00
From this it will be seen that the appropriations already made are not covered either by direct taxation or the authorization of a bond issue or other Government obligations amounting to the difference between	7,445,807,014.96
And	3,538,945,460.00
Or a balance of	3,906,861,554.96

"The next Congress will no doubt provide means for meeting this uncovered amount.

	Per cent.
The percentage to be raised by direct taxation is	36.02
The percentage to be met by Government obligations	63.98

The percentages raised by direct taxation by other countries involved in the present war, after three years of continuous and bloody war, are as follows:

England	26
France	14½
Germany	14⅔
Canada	8

"I also add some tables giving a few details of distribution and some comparisons relating to the appropriations of this memorable year. I am sure that these tables and Senator SMOOT's statement will be found very valuable for future reference:

APPROPRIATIONS.

Military Establishment and War Department, including sums in the Army, Military Academy, deficiency, fortifications, and other acts	$7,522,726,441.39
Naval Establishment and Navy Department, including sums in the naval, deficiency, and other acts	1,604,840,630.43
Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation	1,040,517,500.00
National defense fund placed at the disposal of the President	100,000,000.00
Loans to the allies	7,000,000,000.00
Control of foods and fuels and stimulation of agricultural production	173,846,400.00

Soldiers' and sailors' insurance and family allowances	$176,250,000.00
Interest on bonds and certificates (estimated)	200,000,000.00
All other expenses and services, including insurance of merchant vessels and their crews	102,047,244.55
Expenses of conducting the civil establishment of the Government, including pensions, etc	958,948,738.59
Total appropriations	18,879,177,014.96

CONTRACTS OR AUTHORIZATION IN ADDITION TO APPROPRIATIONS.

Military Establishment	$1,389,452,750.00
Naval Establishment	271,851,175.50
Shipping Board and Emergency Corporation	849,000,000.00
New building for the Treasury Department	1,250,000.00
Total contracts or authorizations	2,511,553,925.50
Grand total appropriations and authorizations	21,390,730,940.46
Sixty-fourth Congress, second session	1,977,210,200.05
Sixty-fifth Congress, first session	16,901,966,814.91
Contract authorizations, 1918	2,511,553,925.50
Total for fiscal year 1918	21,390,730,940.46
Total appropriations, 1918 (exclusive of $7,000,000,000 loans to the allies)	11,879,177,014.96
Total appropriations and contract authorizations (exclusive of $7,000,000,000 loans to the allies)	14,390,730,940.46

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no great interest in the pending amendment, for I think it makes very little difference whether it is voted in or voted out. The real issue between those of us who want some modification of the pending measure and other Senators will arise upon other amendments which will be offered to the bill. Nevertheless, I feel I ought to say a word with regard to the subject before this amendment is voted upon.

It seems to me that Senators have been very industriously during the last few days occupying themselves in the very ancient and honorable pastime of erecting a man of straw in order to gratify themselves in bruising and battering it around the Senate Chamber. What is the issue between those of us who believe there ought to be a modification of the bill and those who believe there ought not to be any change whatsoever made in it? I heard the very interesting and very excellent discourse of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. He did not propose a single thing in which I do not heartily concur and for which I shall not vote with the utmost sincerity, if I am given an opportunity to do so. I heard the observations of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. They, too, were of a practical nature; and I think he is to be congratulated upon his clear and luminous exposition of some of the reforms that are sadly needed; but not a thing did he suggest that meets opposition upon the part of those who insist upon some change in the bill; and he demonstrated anew what we all have known for years, that there ought to be reform in the executive departments of the Government.

I listened yesterday afternoon to the daily lecture of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. He delivers it about the same hour every afternoon, and I think he ought to introduce some variety into the homily which he addresses to the Senate. It is very clear to me from his eloquent speech that he knows a great deal about a great many things, but his observations demonstrate with perfect clearness that he does not know anything whatsoever about the bill now under consideration and upon which we are to vote. Contrary to the advice and injunction of the orators of the ancient times he is insisting upon making a certain illustration, which he constantly uses, immortal by making it eternal. It has been brought before us so often that I feel that I must give very brief attention to the subject of holes and pegs.

Undoubtedly it is true that there are square holes and round holes in the executive departments. Congress made these holes, some of them round and some of them square, and I assume that it did it with reasonable intelligence; but I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi, if he were here, who has selected the pegs which are filling these round holes and these square holes? Congress has had nothing to do with the form of the pegs which are to be inserted from time to time in these holes which legislation has made. What power is it that selects the pegs? What power is it that can remove a round peg from a square hole or a square peg from a round hole? I suggest that before it is insisted very much longer that the whole problem of fighting this war depends upon selecting the right kind of pegs for the right kind of holes, we inquire into the authority which selects the pegs and assigns them to their separate places. We need no additional legislation to select a square man for a square hole; we need no additional authority to be conferred upon the President to enable him to choose a round man for a round hole or a round position. These are things with which the Senate has nothing whatsoever to do, save to confirm, as it does with loyalty and fidelity, from time to time the selections which are made by the President.

I grow a little weary of being lectured day after day upon my disposition toward making the war successful and to select the most efficient agents for its prosecution, when I know that the President has full power with respect to the selection of all the officers of the Government; and I assume, contrary to the inference of the Senator from Mississippi, that he does his very best to fill a square hole with a square man and a round hole with a round man; and if he discovers that he is mistaken in any selection, knowing that he has full authority to lift the peg out of the hole and substitute another for it, he will do so speedily and for the general welfare of the country.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. Does the Senator know of any law which requires the President of the United States to select for either a round hole or a square hole a peg with a wooden head? [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, I have concerned myself only with exterior forms, following the course of the discussion that we have heard so frequently, and I have not looked into the interior in order to satisfy myself with regard to the composition of the peg itself. [Laughter.] I want to follow the President so far as it is possible for me to do so; and, if he is satisfied with the peg, I am willing to concede that he has better opportunities than I have to examine its desirability.

What utter absurdity to stand here and condemn and denounce Senators who believe that there ought to be some modification of this bill upon the repeated assertion that there must be unity, there must be concert of purpose, and that we must have the right kind of pegs and the right kind of holes! We can not add to or take from the authority of the Chief Executive with regard to these selections, and this bill does not pretend to do so. I am very glad that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has at least recognized the Constitution to the extent of not attempting to deprive the President of his constitutional authority to select and nominate and appoint the officers who are to carry on the Government of the United States.

I listened with my accustomed interest to the observations of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. He, too, entirely misapprehends the opposition to certain parts of this bill. No one opposes the bill because the power granted in it may be abused. We all understand that if power is necessary for the prosecution of the war we ought to confer it; and we all know that it may be abused. I am not opposing any part of this bill because I fear that the President will abuse the power given him. I assume that he will exercise it honestly, and according to his view of the Government of which he is the head and the necessities which he confronts. Nor am I impressed with the suggestion that because we have drifted into a bureaucratic Government, therefore we ought to grant these extraordinary powers.

I think that the Senator from Idaho is justified in his criticism of the tendency of Congress to repose too much power in bureaus and commissions. He and I have not disagreed with regard to that principle or policy of the Government. That means, however, that the Congress ought to do a vast amount of work which it has hitherto not done; that means that Congress, instead of investing these bureaus and commissions without number with powers and authority over the people of this country, should have legislated directly for their advantage and for their control and guidance. However, it seems to me quite illogical to insist that because we have in times past surrendered too much power to bureaus and commissions we should complete the crime against good legislation by now surrendering to the President of the United States all the legislative power which we can confer upon him.

This bill will not diminish the number of bureaus or the number of commissions; it will simply give to the President the authority to select some new bureau or some new commission to exercise the functions which we have heretofore conferred upon those agencies which have been created in times that are past.

I come now to state—not to argue, for I have no opportunity, no chance to argue the matter at this time—my objection to this bill; and I believe it the objection of every Senator who proposes to vote against it in its present form. It is this: First, in the negative; I am not opposed to granting the President of the United States the power to coordinate, to consolidate, to transfer within the executive departments of the Government. While I do not think it necessary, and while I think it would be wiser if we would do this specifically instead of generally, I have no opposition to it save this, that I believe the Department of Justice ought not to be included within the blanket power that is conferred.

My opposition arises in this way: We have from year to year in times that are past created certain functions of government, and we have reposed the execution of those functions in commissions or departments entirely removed from the executive branch of the Government. We have done it, because we believed that the people of this country will be better governed and more certainly protected in the administration of the law in that form than in any other. We have created the Interstate Commerce Commission; we have created the Federal Reserve Board; we have created the Federal Trade Commission; we have created the Federal Farm Loan Board; we have created the Civil Service Commission; I need not particularize further, because all Senators have in mind this type of governmental authority. The President never has had any control whatsoever over any of these functions of the Government, save to select the officers who are to perform the various duties imposed upon these bureaus, commissions, and the like. It was in a former day thought to be distinctly wrong—and I am sure I have heard every Senator who stands for this bill declare that it was distinctly wrong—for the President to attempt in any way whatsoever to influence the decision or the conclusion of the bureaus which we have created in the manner I have suggested.

All that I ask is that these functions of government, which have no more to do with the prosecution of the war, with the defense of the country, than has any other activity of any citizen of the land, shall be immune from the operation of this bill. I do not want to give the President the power to transfer the functions and authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission to any person, to anybody, whether commission or bureau or what not. I know that he can not use that power for the prosecution of the war; I know that any attempt to disorganize or to destroy it will weaken the people in the great conflict in which they are engaged.

There has not been a single suggestion that any power that either of these bodies which I have pointed out—and there are many others—now exercise can be used for the better prosecution and more successful management or conduct of the war. The Lord knows I want to make this country as strong as it can be made. I have no other thought or desire in my mind or heart but to carry forward a Government that will utilize the strength of every man, woman, and child in it for the accomplishment of the great purpose to which we are now dedicated for the rescue of the civilization of which we are a part, and I hope a leader.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have stated in this brief way the general ground of the opposition of those who want a modification of this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to appeal to the Senate to let us adopt this amendment. The real issue, as I understand, will come on the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa—probably several amendments with reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission. All the committee amendments but this one have been adopted, and I hope Senators will let this one be adopted. Then I suppose some Senator will introduce an amendment exempting the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and so forth.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before discussing the constitutional feature of this measure—for that is the only phase of it upon which I shall detain the Senate—I wish to digress for a moment to commend the President and congratulate the country upon the selection of Mr. John D. Ryan, upon whom has been conferred the great responsibility of the procurement, production, and manufacture of aircraft, and of all matters referring to the industrial side of our aviation program.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] a few days ago very properly spoke in the highest terms of Mr. Schwab, just before then selected to take charge of our shipping program. When I say, from my personal knowledge of Mr. Ryan—and I have known him for many years—that he measures up as fully to the requirements of his new position as does Mr. Schwab to the requirements of our shipping program, I perhaps say all that is necessary to assure the country that this branch of our war industry, in my judgment, is now placed in apt and efficient hands. I only trust that the President may be equally fortunate in the choice of other individuals upon whom these great responsibilities must rest.

Mr. President, I shall confine myself for a few moments to the consideration of the constitutionality of this measure. If the arguments which have been presented to support the proposition that we have no power to pass the bill be sound, of course it should be rejected, although, if its urgency were so great as to be an absolute essential to the efficient prosecution of the war, we might even then hesitate before finally rejecting it.

There is such a thing, Mr. President, as the laws of war in time of war. It may be difficult to define them, but it is perfectly easy to understand them, by illustration, when required to act. During the Civil War a part of the State of Virginia, opposed to the secession ordinance of that Commonwealth and resolved notwithstanding to remain in the Union, determined, without the consent of Virginia and regardless of constitutional limitations, to organize itself into a separate State and to seek admission into the Union. We know, historically, that that effort succeeded. At the time when the bill for the admission of West Virginia was under discussion in the House of Representatives Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, then the leader of the majority, said:

> I understand that these proceedings all take place, not under any pretense of legal or constitutional right, but in virtue of the laws of war and by the laws of nations. These laws are just what we choose to make them, so that they are not inconsistent with humanity.

That, Mr. President, is a very broad, perhaps too broad and comprehensive, definition of the laws of war—that they are just what we choose to make them, so they are not inconsistent with humanity.

Mr. Stevens proceeded:

> I say, then, that we may admit West Virginia as a new State, not by virtue of any provision of the Constitution but under our absolute power, which the laws of war give us in the circumstances in which we are placed. I shall vote for this bill upon that theory, and upon that alone, for I will not stultify myself by supposing that we have any warrant in the Constitution for this proceeding.

So that if it were necessary, Mr. President, for the salvation of our country to resort to the laws of war for the enactment of needed legislation we might find ample authority for it in many precedents of the Civil War, and perhaps some precedents in other wars to which the country has been subjected since its creation.

If I understand the arguments against the constitutionality of this measure, they may be summed up in the idea that we are conferring unusual executive powers upon the President, or that we are delegating legislative authority to him, or both.

Mr. President, if this bill purports to invest the President with executive authority, plainly it is beyond our power to do so, because the Congress has no executive authority unless the treaty-making power, a portion of which is conferred upon the Senate, and the power to confirm or reject appointments, which is also conferred upon the Senate, and the power to declare war, may be so considered. The Constitution in express terms declares that the executive authority shall be vested in a President of the United States—the executive power; not a portion of it, but all of it. In dealing with Congress the Constitution declares that—> all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Not all legislative power is conferred upon Congress, but "all legislative powers herein granted" are so conferred. The executive power, however, is without limitation, conferred upon a President of the United States. Hence, any attempt upon the part of Congress to add to or to take from that executive authority would seem to be beyond our sphere and therefore impossible. If this bill sought to add to an executive authority already conferred, therefore it would be an idle task; first, because we have no such power to confer, and, second, because the Constitution itself has granted all of it to a President of the United States.

I must therefore conclude that whatever else may be said against the validity of this proposed measure it can not be attacked successfully upon the theory that it proposes to or can clothe the President with an executive power which he does not already possess as his constitutional prerogative.

There remains, therefore, the question whether we are delegating legislative authority to the Executive which it is beyond our constitutional power to do.

As was well stated by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] yesterday, we are conferring no authority, we are conferring no bureaucratic or departmental power, which has not by preexisting laws been provided for, together with the particular bureau or department which is to exercise it. This bill, unless amendments to it shall be offered, creates no new exercise of power. What it proposes to do is to enable the President of the United States to rearrange and redistribute authority already conferred so that efficiency may result, and a more vigorous prosecution of the war may be possible. I think it may be safely said that Congress might have clothed the President with authority to perform every function which is now performed by the State Department, the War Department, the Treasury Department, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, and the multitude of other agencies which have been created, and appointments to which, for the discharge of these duties, are made by the President, subject to confirmation by the Senate.

Who can doubt, for example, that in the creation of the Federal Reserve Board Congress, had it been so disposed, might have directly clothed the President with every function exercised by that body, and also clothed him with the authority to designate those who would assist him in the discharge of these duties? If it be true—and I think it can not be questioned—that our original legislation might have been directed to the President himself instead of these various bureaus, then it equally follows that we may now clothe him with the authority to redistribute these agencies, to remove from one department this authority and to clothe some other department with that authority, just in proportion as it may seem to be essential to the unusual duties which now devolve upon the Executive. So that we are merely doing now by this bill something which could have been done in the first instance. Whether it be wise, whether it be expedient to do so, is quite another question; but I am concerned now solely with the proposition whether Congress can constitutionally clothe the President with these powers of redistribution.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator whether his attention has been called to the statute originally creating the War, Navy, and State Departments, wherein it is provided that these powers, while conferred upon the three Secretaries, are to be executed under the direction and control of the President?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. So that, therefore, at one time they were all vested in the President.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. And, furthermore, by amendments, much of the authority now proposed to be vested is vested in the Secretaries. They are all authorized to redistribute the functions of their departments, just as this bill authorizes the President to do.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. President, I am familiar with these facts, and also with the fact that in creating the Treasury Department Congress departed from that method of legislation and clothed the Treasury Department directly with powers which were to be exercised not under, but independent of, the control of the President.

Mr. President, certainly centralization is essential to the prosecution of the war. No man can doubt that. In my judgment, it has become highly essential to the effective operation of governmental functions in times of peace. This Government must, and will after the war, be more highly centralized than it has been in times past. The agencies of the Government, the various matters over which it exercises jurisdiction, the tremendous scope of Executive authority, essentially require for efficient and systematic and economic government a greater centralization of authority than is now possessed and exercised. I think the obvious necessity of this condition had much to do with influencing President Taft to appoint the commission upon a rearrangement of our governmental agencies, which, as we know, made its report some time ago; and there can be no doubt but that had Congress acted upon the recommendations of Mr. Taft's commission and by legislation had empowered him to redistribute, rearrange, consolidate, and eliminate these various bureaus and agencies so as to produce greater efficiency and economy in government, no man could have successfully questioned our power to have done so; and that is precisely what we are attempting to do at present.

Of course, we are always confronted with the possibility of the abuse of authority when it is granted. That contingency is inseparable from any important legislation. We must, independently of that possibility, act without regard to it, if we are to succeed in our legislative task, relying upon the wisdom, the patriotism, and the force of public opinion to control its exercise. Moreover, Mr. President, government must exercise its judgment in administration not alone by the standards of written law but as well by those of wisdom, justice, and expediency, as times and events may require. Mr. Burke has given expression to this thought in the following language:

> The laws reach but a very little way. Constitute government how you please, infinitely the greater part of it must depend upon the exercise of powers which are left at large to the prudence and uprightness of ministers of state. Even all the use and potency of the laws depends upon them. Without them your Commonwealth is no better than a scheme upon paper, and not a living, active, effective organization.

I am of opinion this bill is not subject to any constitutional objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I heard yesterday with great pleasure the remarks of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I always listen to him, with his learning and his pleasing power of expression, as an entertainment. The principal argument he used was the peg-and-hole argument. I have heard it many times from the same Senator. I always hear it with pleasure although repeated, because he gives it with such variations it never becomes stale, flat, and unprofitable by that repetition. Because of his pleasing diction, his copious vocabulary, and his exuberant imagination, I listened with the usual pleasure to his comments upon the bill. The substance of his argument was embodied in a paragraph which is as follows:

> I do not think that a committee on the conduct of the war representing the legislative branch of the Government is exactly the right way to carry on the war, but if you will give me power to put square pegs in square holes and round pegs in round holes and take square pegs out of round holes and round pegs out of square holes, I can improve the efficiency of the various executive bureaus of the Government and decrease its inefficiency.

To avoid these misfits in the executive department, its honored head must possess an elementary knowledge of contour, outline, form, and space, with sometimes the happy faculty of making a good guess on the length of the peg and the depth of the hole, as well as an intuition of what the contents of the hole are likely to be. An error in the latter instinct frequently leads to sore disappointment and grievous recriminations. Many a hunter has come to grief by thrusting his hand into a hole not previously investigated. A good mechanical joint requires not only the right union of form and material but a close fit. Lacking this, destructive friction, delays, and ultimate dissolution of the machinery ensues.

A political master mechanic if inspecting the executive power house with practiced ear and eye would hear sounds and see things indicating not only a want of a correlation of forces but would distinguish a loose clatter caused by empty holes from pegs too short to reach through and naked pegs resulting from inexcusably shallow holes.

An inquisitive or censorious loiterer might casually inquire what mechanical engineer framed this clacking libel that outraged his suffering ears. He might implore some passer-by to vouchsafe him the information how long this creaking pandemonium had disturbed the peace of the neighborhood or threatened its lives. On learning over five years had elapsed no doubt a stormy blast of his vociferous indignation would mount to an empyrean altitude.

It might be assumed the Government supply house is filled with pegs both round and square. Holes could be procured ad libitum as needed by the very simple and obvious process of pulling out the misfit pegs inserted during the last five years by the same fellow who says it can not be done. He does not require any new holes either. In addition to those turned over to him by his predecessor he has created over 100,000 new holes. Now he is dissatisfied because he has made a mistake in the kind of holes or getting the wrong pegs in the right place. As near as the uncultured populace can understand, being without university degrees or capital letters after their signatures, when they undertake to grasp this departmental chaos by any visible handhold it is this: He now wants power to scrap the outfit and let him start in fresh. One that can not make a better batting average pegging holes on a five-year circuit had better let Congress help him awhile till he learns more about human pegs. Otherwise, if he knocks down all the material in the departments he might never be able to set it up again during war times. He might get nervous and excited like some of us were three or four years ago when he was too proud to fight, told foreigners there must be peace without victory, advised watchful waiting, and later reminded us all around our respective homes that he had "kept us out of war."

He had a chance to practice on the Shipping Board ever since September 7, 1916. There was a brand new lot of holes. The pegs were human shipbuilders. They were plentiful in the American supply house. He promptly filled the holes with two lawyers under suspicion of political activities, a lumberman well along in years who knew as much about shipbuilding as I do of theology. The fourth man had operated steamships, and the fifth had a lifetime experience in both building and operating ships. The last-named competent man sized up the pegs thrust into the board's organization holes and unanimously retired while it was reasonably quiet. It was not a lack of power or an assortment of holes and pegs the matter. It was color blindness that made a politician look like a shipbuilder. One time while he was experimenting with his peculiar ideas about pegs and the five holes on the board, a delegation of steel manufacturers came to Washington. They wanted to see him about shipbuilding. In the absorbing pursuit of pegging holes he could not possibly see them. He found time only to say he was thinking about commandeering their plants and turning the steel business over to some great captain of human language like Victor Murdock, just as he is now having them investigate the packing-house business to know how to furnish the Army and Navy with meats. Then he went on with his peg game. After three misfits he found Hurley and Piez, who pegged into the right holes promptly. These men thought somebody like Schwab, who had been run out of town with the rest of the steel delegation a year or two ago, would be useful. The last three are the only pegs which the President has fitted in on this end of the administration cribbage board. The only thing to keep him awake nights on the Shipping Board now is Raymond Stevens, who is the vermiform appendix of that body. He is a peg that never fit any place. He is liable to get inflamed most any day and have to be amputated. Uncle Sam would be like other millionaires if he does have appendicitis from this useless member of his anatomy. This appendix has already cost him several million dollars by its impossible antics with pay rolls and appropriations. I mention him as an appendix because he is a peg that never fit any hole, square or round. All anyone can do with him is to just let him stick out and keep him from being sore.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has not the Senator observed that Mr. Stevens is now in Europe conferring with the great shipmasters of England on the shipping question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I had understood that he was absent in a foreign post, but I did not know definitely what his motive was, and thanking the Senator from New Hampshire for the information to be added here to this mine of information, whether he will come back with any practical knowledge of shipbuilding I very much doubt. I am perfectly willing that he should have steamship passage and expenses paid, however, for the sake of being out of the United States. That would be a net gain to the Government. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The occupants of the galleries must preserve order. The Presiding Officer under the rules will be compelled to clear the galleries if disorder occurs.

Mr. SHERMAN. Right at the beginning of his superintendency of governmental mechanism he appointed my beloved friend and neighbor, Mr. Bryan, Secretary of State. The new Secretary had a multifarious knowledge of many things, a marathon record for continuous unquenchable oratory, an inexhaustible capacity for the absorption of Chautauqua gate money, and an unappeasable yearning to bankrupt the plutocrats of the entire country. It was not material whether diplomacy and our foreign relations were either square or round holes. His celebrated letter on the San Domingo matter showed that it was immaterial whether the right peg got into the right hole or not, so the peg was "a deserving Democrat." The President once expressed a curiosity to a certain editor to know if some dignified way might not be discovered of knocking Mr. Bryan into a cocked hat. The President solved his own conundrum by appointing him Secretary of State. Grape juice and an incurable propensity to pacificism accomplished their fiendish designs. The free-silver peg sank without a gurgle into the clutches of the Chautauqua profiteer.

Lindley Garrison was a square peg in a square hole. He began to gear up the machinery to operate. He soon became uncongenial among many pegs in the wrong kind of holes. The President did not do much to make him feel at home in the Cabinet family, so he resigned. The President looked over his pegs once more. He got hold of a pacifist peg and jammed it into the muzzle of a war hole. Everybody was comfortable again around the Cabinet table, but the public has been much concerned—even worried—ever since.

Then W. B. Wilson became the Secretary of Labor peg and Mr. Burleson the Postmaster General. One used to work for the Erie Railroad. Mr. Burleson used to run a cotton farm in Texas. Both agree on socialism. They both agreed further on being official misfits in the holes where the President put them. They differed on convict labor in Texas, but agreed to stand it off against the interior finish of the jails in Maryland.

A coterie of single-tax pegs have been crowded into Democratic holes. It is a painful fit, but even a single taxer can stifle his lifetime convictions of yesterday to get on the Government pay roll. He can then draw a salary from unprincipled Democrats and rascally Republicans who hold real estate. He can console himself by meditating on the iniquity of consuming the unearned increment of Democratic politics. This pleasure is aggravated by observing that many of the unterrified faithful who carried their wards by unprecedented majorities are loitering on the curbstone without recognition in the Capitol of an ungrateful Republic.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] a few moments ago made the statement that no one had suggested a single benefit or detriment to the war which could be effected by independent bureaus such as the Federal Reserve Board and banks or the Interstate Commerce Commission and their appointees.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senator has overlooked the powers of these great bureaus. It is true they are independent of the Executive, but it is that very independence which creates possibilities of delaying or hindering the prosecution of the war.

What is there more necessary to the prosecution of a war than to have finances, than to have a banking system that will advance the necessary funds, and what detriment could persons who are connected with the Federal reserve banks be with relation to the supply or payment of money for the Government?

We must take into consideration that these independent bureaus have a power to injure as well as a power to aid and assist. We can not raise an army without money. We can not have ships built without money; we can not have munitions of war manufactured without money, and yet an amendment is offered to except from the operation of this act this great bureau, so necessary to keep the finances of the Government in good condition.

Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Iowa the fact that great injury could be done by the officers of the Federal reserve banks if they were opposed to the war and great hindrance in the successful prosecution thereof could be effected. The United States Government keeps a large amount of money in the Federal reserve banks. Suppose the officers thereof should say, "We will not honor the checks or drafts of the Secretary of the Treasury," would it not hamper, would it not injure, would it not seriously deter the preparation for the conflict? Would it not deter the operation of the war and the successful prosecution of it?

Mr. President, one may say that is improbable. That is true, it is not likely to occur; but the limitation of all powers is imposed for the purpose of preventing possible abuses. Unless some central authority has the power to remove an officer who would commit such an act, we have the condition of having an independent body which might exercise powers which would hinder and delay the prosecution of the war.

Mr. President, take any of the functions of the Federal reserve banks. Suppose officers should say, "We do not believe in obeying the law as to the reserves; we are not going to have a gold reserve back of their currency." That, of course, would injure our standing and injure our credit. Is it possible that officers clothed with power to issue currency would not be in position to aid or retard or effect the prosecution of the war?

Mr. President, the officers of the Federal reserve banks are replete with great powers that can aid the war, with great capacity to be a detriment to the prosecution of the war, and it seems to me that that system above all others should be included in the operation of this law.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa believes in vesting power in the President. He says he is not afraid of usurpation of power. Unquestionably the concentration of power is absolutely necessary in war. I fully agree with him. The very laws that we would all be against in a time of peace become absolutely necessary when we are in war. When we talk about concentration we know that the President must have the power of changing not only a clerk here and there, but he must have the power to change or transpose men who are in the very highest authority.

Some Senators have said this bill is of very little moment because the President already has the power to make these changes. If that is true, then it seems to me there is not much harm to be done by the passage of the law.

But, Mr. President, I am one of those persons who believe that there is great power conferred in this bill; that it is not merely the authority of removal of clerks from one department to another, but that it involves the grant of such powers as will determine whether or not these great bureaus are going to lend their aid and assistance in the prosecution of the war or whether or not they are going to act as a deterring force in the prosecution of the same.

It is true that abuses are not likely to occur, but you have got to pick out an extreme illustration to make clear the importance of including all bureaus in the operation of this measure. It is true that we would have the right of removal by probably an impeachment of the officer, but what does that mean?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Has not the President the right to remove a member of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not say that express provision is not given, and he must be confirmed by the Senate—and it may be there are decisions to that effect—but, as a matter of fact, the power vested in the President in this bill would unquestionably give it to him, and there should be no hesitation about exercising it in an appropriate case.

It is said, you know, that in the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson the contention was made that the President could not remove a Cabinet officer. No Cabinet officer ever has been removed, because the ordinary courtesy and propriety require that such officers should tender their resignations. But, Mr. President, this bill should give to the President the power to remove not only the members of the Federal Reserve Board but the officers of any of the Federal reserve banks. I do not believe that the President has the power to remove the directors of a Federal reserve bank, for they are not appointed by the President. That power exists somewhere to remove them, but it does not exist in the President. Those banks are the ones that would have the power to aid and assist in or to deter in the prosecution of the war. Some of the directors of the Federal reserve banks are selected by the Government and some are placed there by the independent action of the national banks.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are some of them who are put there by the men who own stock in the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr SMITH of Georgia. Ought not the men whose money is in the banks have a right to put somebody there to represent them?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, I will say that some of the safeguards and checks that in time of peace are so commendable and proper become retardant factors and should be set aside in times of war. The Government directors evidently are the persons who could not be removed by the President, and I have not any doubt that many of the men who carry out the administrative measures and who are appointed, not by the President but by the boards themselves, could not be removed by the President.

Mr. President, these matters are of great moment. I believe that in the prosecution of a war, when the very life and existence of our Government is at stake, we should bend every energy and use every power of the Government for the purpose of expediting the prosecution of the war, and for the purpose of preventing those persons who might hinder or impede the prosecution of the war from doing so, so that their influence could not be effective. We have the greatest war of all history on hand; it is going to take billions and billions of dollars to end it. Every Senator in this Chamber wants it ended successfully for the arms of the United States. We should present every measure and should pass every measure that will tend to have that effect.

Mr. President, suppose the question were to arise as to a Federal reserve bank, whether certain powers that it possesses should be exercised. Suppose its officers should say: "We will not extend any credit and will not issue any Federal reserve notes; you have complied with the law; you have presented your security; you have presented your gold reserve, but we will not issue any note." Should not the man charged with the duty of prosecuting effectively the war have the power to remove them, although they are not appointed by him?

Is it not absolutely necessary to the successful prosecution of this war that we should have these Federal reserve notes and that the credit of the Government be extended through the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. President, suppose the officers were to say, "We will issue notes without any security." They have the physical power to do it, though it is not likely they would attempt it. It seems to me, therefore, that no one will deny that this system is intimately connected with the operations which are necessary in the successful prosecution of the war and that their proper cooperation is indispensable to the proper conduct of the war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am trying to follow the Senator carefully, and I desire to ask, Does the Senator mean to argue that we ought to give the President power to reverse the action of the Federal Reserve Board on all occasions that he sees fit to do so?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; not on all occasions. There are certain discretionary powers which are vested in them, and as to those discretionary powers I doubt very much whether such action on the part of the President could be taken.

Mr. GALLINGER. I apprehend that the Senator has not any anxiety, so far as the Federal Reserve Board is concerned, that it will do anything relative to the finances of the country that will be inimical to the prosecution of the war?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; Mr. President, I have the very highest regard for the officers of the Federal reserve banks and also for the Federal Reserve Board. They are composed of most excellent, honorable gentlemen.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought that was the Senator's position.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But, Mr. President, it is a question of possibilities. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has stated that nobody has suggested that their action could be of any benefit or detriment to the prosecution of the war and therefore should be excepted from the bill. It seems to me when I cite, then, instances of where their action could be of inestimable benefit or of great detriment, it conclusively shows the necessity of having them included in this bill. For similar reasons it seems to me that it is very important that the Interstate Commerce Commission and their appointees should also be included in it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, logically the Senator's argument reaches this point, that we ought to pass over all the functions and powers of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the President. That is the conclusion, is it not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I must say that, if there is a conflict upon the question of the action of the Federal Reserve Board with relation to matters that are plain and clear, the President ought to have the right and the power to remove or to transfer whomsoever he desires from that position, otherwise there would not be any head to the conduct of the war.

Mr. President, as to the appointment of Government directors of Federal reserve banks, the President has no power to appoint them. The Federal Reserve Board might say, "We will not appoint directors at all," and thus prevent temporarily the operation of the banks. I think the Federal Reserve System is one of the most indispensable agencies that could possibly be devised to be used to the advantage or to the detriment of the successful prosecution of the war. For those reasons, it seems to me that it ought to be included in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator's view therefore is that this bill extends the control of the President to the management of the 12 reserve banks as well as to the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I believe the President has no power, nor does this bill give him any power, of directing what they should do; but when the President finds that a man is absolutely unfaithful to the trust which is reposed in him he will have a right under this proposed legislation to remove him or to change him whether he appointed him or not. I regard this bill as not merely a bill for the transfer of clerks, but I believe it is a bill which gives great power to the President. For that reason I believe that the President should have the power to remove any of the officers for unfaithfulness in office.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. LODGE. Does not the Senator from Colorado think that the President now has, and always has had, the power of removal of any officer?

Mr. SHAFROTH. As I stated a little while ago, the directors of these banks are appointed by the board and not by the President. Of course, I have no doubt that a suggestion from him to the Federal Reserve Board that one of the Federal reserve-bank directors, or even the president of a Federal reserve bank, ought to be removed would meet with the response which the President would desire; but the power does not exist in the President, because no one can remove except the power that appoints; and inasmuch as the Federal reserve-bank presidents and the Federal reserve-bank directors who represent the Government are not subject to appointment by the President he has no power to remove them.

Of course, Mr. President, these things are not likely to occur, because the people and officers of the United States are patriotic; but it seems to me that we ought to put all the power that is necessary for the prosecution of the war into the hands of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. I am perfectly willing to trust the President in that respect. The President's whole course in public life has been in favor of the rights and liberties of the people; and so long as there is a limitation in the bill to the effect that it shall only be operative during the period of the war there is no danger of usurpation; there is no danger of the exercise arbitrarily of power, except as to those matters which are vitally connected with the proper prosecution of the war.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him further?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator and I sat patiently in the committee room of the Committee on Finance, as did the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], for a good many days listening to arguments in behalf of the creation of a great financial corporation, having $500,000,000 at its disposal to start with and authority to multiply that by eight, making $4,500,000,000 in all, the Secretary of the Treasury being largely in control of that corporation. Would the Senator, after our trials and tribulations in considering and passing that bill—and it is a law now—pass that over to the President to deal with as he pleases?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, suppose the members of that board arbitrarily and willfully should conclude that they want to obstruct the prosecution of the war and should use their efforts in that direction, I will ask the Senator if it would be possible to conduct the war properly if such an independent body could operate against the very measures which the President deems necessary for the successful prosecution of the war?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Secretary of the Treasury is not likely to do that, and he is the controlling power.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; he is not likely to do that; but the contention has been made that such officers as those to whom I have referred could take no action looking either toward the advancement or the retarding of the prosecution of the war, and therefore should be excepted from this bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, we can conceive anything; we can conceive that the President might do things that were not justifiable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly; that is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. We can conceive that there may be foundation for a rumor that is now out, which is absolutely without foundation, that the President actually desires peace; we can conceive that; but it is not really conceivable in the minds of intelligent men.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, Mr. President, the question is whether we are going to give this power over independent bureaus. I think this power is necessary in the prosecution of war and should be given to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It seems to me that there are possibilities—not probabilities, I concede, but possibilities—that there might be a retarding or an acceleration of this war by reason of the use of the powers that are vested in independent boards, and the power of removal or exchange should, therefore, exist in the President.

I have not touched upon the expeditious and economic effect of the coordination and consolidation of bureaus and the elimination of delays and red tape therein, which I will present at another time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the pending bill permitting the President to coordinate the different departments of the Government and the different bureaus in those departments ought to be amended as suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. Personally, I can see no reason for including in the purview of this measure the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Reserve Board; nor, for that matter, the Departments of State, Commerce, Agriculture, Justice, Labor, or Post Office. In fact, the only two departments that really need to be rearranged in these war times are the War and Navy, and I trust the bill will be amended to include just these two departments.

In time of war the Executive must necessarily be clothed with extraordinary powers, and on every occasion since the outbreak of the war I have been willing to give the President the power necessary to carry this conflict to a successful conclusion. Senators have discussed this measure at length, and others will before the bill is finally voted on, but I shall occupy the time of the Senate but for a few moments. It seems to me in this war, as in every other war, the first thing to be considered is to see that the country is really unified and can be depended upon to stand back of the Government. Of this to-day there can be no doubt. The Nation is completely unified. It was not in the beginning, but now from every portion of the land there is abundant evidence of the fact that the vast majority of the people of this Nation have determined to see the conflict through. It has been brought home to them through the fact that nearly every family in the land has one or more of its sons in the Army or Navy. It is now their war—the people's war—and they will do their full duty under the circumstances.

Then, too, wars are won by intelligent, patriotic leadership. At the beginning of this war we found a disposition on the part of men who are of the President's political party to insist that the slightest criticism from those of opposite political belief indicated that they were anxious to make political capital out of the war situation. In the beginning the idea that a Republican could be of more value to the Nation than a Democrat was seriously objected to. It is true that some men who came here were of the Republican faith. Only those were taken, however, who were willing to tender their services without compensation, and even some of these were frowned upon. The Government did not seem to realize that only men should be selected for the important posts who were best qualified to fill them.

I have often wondered why the President in naming the men for the Shipping Board did not pick out at least one shipbuilder. I recall that when one of the members of that board was appointed I objected to his confirmation solely on the ground that he knew nothing about the business in which he was to be engaged, and for that I was accused of being unpatriotic.

Now, the President has begun to realize that we must select the best-equipped men if we are to win, even if they are of opposite political faith, and so we have Mr. Vanderlip in the Treasury; Mr. Schwab on the Shipping Board; Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Keppel in the War Department; and even the advice of Mr. Taft has been asked in the Department of Labor. Some changes have also been made in the military personnel of the War Department. We have Gen. March as Acting Chief of Staff and Gen. Goethals, Assistant Chief of Staff and Acting Quartermaster General. These with the other men who have served as the heads of the various bureaus in the Military Establishment since the war began and have occupied very important places—Gen. Crowder, Provost Marshal General and Judge Advocate General; Gen. McCain, The Adjutant General; and Gen. Gorgas at the head of the Medical Department of the Army—these officers, Mr. President, are fast putting confidence in the Army through their disposition to handle these matters as they ought to be.

But, after all, has not the President sufficient authority to do all those things without our enacting this legislation? Is it not largely a question of leadership? It seems to me that with the mistakes that have been made already, and many of them have been remedied, there is just one thing to do now. Let us build our military and industrial establishment on the theory that in the end we are going to fight this war out alone. It is true, Mr. President, that we do not expect that such will be the situation, but if we prepare on the basis that it will be, if we at once provide for the registration of every man and woman in the country between the ages of 18 and 50 and after that registration give each one of them the job to do that he or she is best equipped for, and then provide as rapidly as it can be trained and equipped an Army of at least 5,000,000 men—if we do that the whole world will know that the spirit of the entire Nation is behind the Government, and then we will come to certain victory.

Despite all the mistakes and extravagances we have not done so badly in the 12½ months we have been in this war. Stop and think, Senators, that on the day we declared war we had an Army—a mobile Army in continental United States—of approximately 50,000 men with a National Guard of barely 100,000. To-day our Army consists of approximately 1,900,000 men, and we have increased our Navy from 50,000 to 300,000.

We are just getting this vast war machine into motion and when it gets its full momentum no power on earth can withstand it.

It has often been argued that an autocracy is the only government that can make war successfully. It seemed in the beginning that this was so, but when we appreciate the fact that at the very outbreak of this conflict we were able to enact a measure calling for the drafting of the youth of our land with hardly a protest you can understand that a free country—a Republic organized such as ours, if the country is unified—in the end can build a military machine greater than even that of an autocracy.

And so, Mr. President, without involving ourselves in differences over a measure, much of which is not fundamentally essential, let us amend this bill permitting the President to reorganize and coordinate all the functions of the War and Navy Departments, and then enact legislation registering all the men and all the women of the Nation and organize them in the broadest possible way to insure the biggest military and industrial armies the world has ever seen. When this is done, then we can be certain that the war will be won. If this is not done, or if we delay in doing it, perhaps like Russia and Belgium, Serbia and Roumania, our Nation may be destroyed almost before we have started or, like France, we may be pushed to the very edge of the precipice, or, like England and Italy, may drain our country dry of both its men and its money, and even then with uncertain result.

Let us leave nothing to chance. Then the war will be won in a much shorter period than the people of the world have any idea of at present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I only want to speak about one minute on this bill, I think.

I ask that the bill, with the committee amendments, be printed in the RECORD at the beginning of my remarks, so that it will be apparent to what I refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 3771) introduced by Mr. OVERMAN on February 6, 1918, and reported by Mr. OVERMAN March 21, 1918, with amendments, is as follows:

A bill authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces, the President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act, and to this end is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary, which regulations and orders shall be in writing and shall be filed with the head of the department affected and constitute a public record: Provided, That this act shall remain in force during the continuance of the present war and for one year after the termination of the war by the proclamation of the treaty of peace, or at such earlier time during the said year as the President may designate: Provided further, That the termination of this act shall not affect any act done or any right or obligation accruing or accrued pursuant to this act and during the time that this act is in force: Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized to utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers now existing by law, to transfer any duties or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another, to transfer the personnel thereof or any part of it, either by detail or assignment, together with the whole or any part of the records and public property belonging thereto.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, any moneys heretofore and hereafter appropriated for the use of any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer shall be expended only for the purposes for which it was appropriated under the direction of such other agency as may be directed by the President hereunder to perform and execute said function.

SEC. 4. That should the President, in redistributing the functions among the executive agencies as provided in this act, conclude that any bureau should be abolished and it or their duties and functions conferred upon some other department or bureau or eliminated entirely, he shall report his conclusions to Congress with such recommendations as he may deem proper.

SEC. 5. That all laws or parts of laws conflicting with the provisions of this act are to the extent of such conflict suspended while this act is in force.

Upon the termination of this act all executive or administrative agencies, departments, commissions, bureaus, offices, or officers shall exercise the same functions, duties, and powers as heretofore or as hereafter by law my be provided, any authorization of the President under this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the bill provides:

The President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act.

Then it provides that he shall make such regulations and issue such orders as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized to utilize, coordinate—or consolidate any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers now existing by law, to transfer any duties or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another, to transfer the personnel thereof or any part of it either by detail or assignment, together with the whole or any part of the records and public property belonging thereto.

Whatever that may mean in law—

Mr. President, there are three departments to this Government—the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. Every executive department of this Government was created by an act of Congress, by a United States statute. Their powers and jurisdictions are conferred by Congress. They have no power, no duties, no functions, except those that Congress conferred upon them. When Congress passed the statutes that created these executive departments and commissions and agencies and officers, it defined and delimited their jurisdictions by statutes. That was a legislative act. Now, it is solemnly proposed to the legislative branch of the Government that it confer upon the executive branch of the Government the authority to divest departments, commissions, officers, and agencies of the authority with which Congress clothed them by statute, and to allow the President to reinvest them with other authorities and jurisdictions.

Mr. President, in my opinion, as a lawyer, that is an utterly impotent and impudent attempt, for Congress to abdicate its legislative power and attempt to confer it upon the executive branch of the Government. If it was a legislative act and required a legislative act in the beginning to create an executive department or commission and to define its jurisdiction, it is equally a legislative act to withdraw that jurisdiction in order to take it away from one commission or bureau and to confer it upon another.

The various executive departments and agents and commissions of this Government have been created by Congress, as I have said. Their jurisdiction has been carefully limited and delimited and hedged about with various checks and balances, designed for the particular department or officer. Now, it is proposed to cast into a melting pot all the powers that Congress has ever given to any and all executive departments and agencies of this Government, and to attempt to confer upon the executive branch of the Government the power, overnight and from minute to minute, to dip his executive spoon into this mass of porridge and ladle out such portions as he may please of this great mass of authority with which Congress has vested the executive departments since the foundation of this Government. It is attempted to authorize him to ladle it out teaspoonful by teaspoonful, from minute to minute, between two days, overnight, if necessary in his opinion; to vest the powers of the Treasury Department to-day in the Interstate Commerce Commission; to vest the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Comptroller of the Currency; to vest the powers which Congress reposed in a Fuel Administrator in the Food Administrator; and to vest the powers of the Food Administrator in a clerk of the War Department; to take the powers that Congress conferred upon the Federal Reserve Board and turn them over to any agency, officer, or commission that is in existence now by law.

Mr. President, I do not believe that we ought to come to that in this free country. If the President thinks that one department ought to have more power, or that another department ought to have other power, and can give a good reason for it, any minute that he will come before Congress and say so, Congress by legislative act will grant that power or change it to suit the occasion. But to say that Congress must abdicate, must turn over its legislative functions to the Executive, is to ask something that can not be done under our Constitution, even if we were craven enough to want to do it.

There is no rhyme or reason in any such request or any such bill as this, in my humble opinion. It is hard enough to place responsibility now; it is hard enough to find out who is responsible for blunders and inefficiency and delays; but when you give the President of the United States, if it could be done constitutionally, the power to shift these functions and responsibilities from minute to minute from one set of his appointees to another, how is the American people ever to locate the responsibility or to tell which officials are efficient and which officials are inefficient?

This is done in the name of democracy, Mr. President. This is done in the name of pitiless publicity, of turning on the light, of not doing anything in a dark corner, of open diplomacy, and to make the world safe for democracy; and we are asked to confer upon the President powers which in my opinion we can not confer under the Constitution, and which we ought not to confer if we could.

In my opinion the bill is not worth the paper it is written on. Thank God, we have a Supreme Court in this country yet; and

I think that court will be zealous and anxious to maintain in all their pristine purity the three separate departments of this Government, so that in waging a war to make the world safe for democracy, or to make the United States safe for the Democratic Party, it shall not be necessary to set up an autocracy in this country, and an irresponsible autocracy at that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is of the view that this bill is unconstitutional. I will ask him if the act from which I am about to read does not confer upon the President substantially the same kind of power that the proposed bill does:

The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate duplication of service in the various executive departments of the Government, including bureaus and divisions, and make a report to the President, who is hereby authorized, after such report shall have been made to him, whenever he finds such duplication to exist, to abolish the same.

If he is given such authority as that, is it not just what the Senator is complaining of now as being unconstitutional? In other words, this act is what is known as the Bureau of Efficiency act, and it was passed on March 3, 1917. The Senator was then a Member of the Senate, and the RECORD does not show that the Senator voted against that act. If the present bill is unconstitutional, why is not the act of 1917, which I have just read, unconstitutional also, in that it gives the President the right to abolish an office?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not recall the act to which the Senator refers. It may well be that the act to which he refers is unconstitutional. I do not know. I have given the matter no consideration. I may have voted for many an unconstitutional thing since I have been in Congress. Very likely I have. I have tried to vote against some things that I thought were unconstitutional, and have been properly and duly berated as not being sufficiently progressive and up to date in so doing. Nevertheless, I have my opinion, and my nerve is still stiff and firm.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will indulge me again, I will say that the reason why I mention this matter is because of the very great respect I have for the Senator's opinion. Just a few days ago, as the Senator will recall, he was before our committee, and I agreed with him very fully in his views as to the constitutionality of the particular matter then before us. I have very great respect for the Senator's views; and yet I can not see the difference in principle between the powers conferred upon the President in the act of 1917 which I have just read, and which everybody seems to think is constitutional, and the powers conferred in the bill we now have before us.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it may be that there is no difference; and if that is so I do not blame the Senator for not being able to see the difference. It may be that the other act is unconstitutional. I will ask him if he will be kind enough to read it again. I did not quite comprehend what he read.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention especially to the last clause:

The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate duplication of service in the various executive departments of the Government, including bureaus and divisions, and make a report to the President, who is hereby authorized, after such report shall have been made to him, whenever he finds such duplication to exist, to abolish the same.

Of course the Senator can see that that gives the President the undoubted right, upon the report of that bureau, to abolish offices that Congress has created, and yet, in my judgment, because the Executive was authorized to do that with the executive branch of the Government, that does not confer legislative power upon the President, but it is an executive function.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I think I can clearly distinguish between the situation in the act to which he has referred and the status of this bill in this respect——

Mr. McKELLAR. That was really what I desired to hear the Senator do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is one thing for Congress to pass a statute authorizing the President, when he ascertains a particular set of facts to exist, to put into operation the statute that Congress has passed or to suspend it, and it is another thing for Congress to authorize the President to pass legislative acts. We are continually, in every tariff bill that we pass, putting in provisions to the effect that if the President shall at any time ascertain that any foreign nation is discriminating against our goods, then he is authorized to raise the duties or to lower them within certain limits and according to a certain rule that Congress establishes. That is not conferring legislative power upon the executive branch. We do the legislating and authorize the Executive, as a mere administrative act, to press the button when he ascertains a certain fact to exist. That is not legislating, and that is the distinction I make between the two acts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall that even there a great many people believed that the very kind of power that was granted under the tariff act to which the Senator evidently refers gave the President the right to suspend the operation of the law in certain cases. It was contended very vehemently on the floor that the act was unconstitutional because it gave the President legislative power over purely legislative matters, yet when it went to the Supreme Court, I believe in the noteworthy opinion of Field against Clark, it was declared to be constitutional and not unconstitutional as it was claimed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hear what the Senator says—that some people may have thought that the act was unconstitutional. What has that got to do with this case? It may be that they were wrong in thinking that it was unconstitutional to authorize the President to do those things. The Supreme Court decided that they were wrong. If there was any such contention made that has nothing to do with this case, in my opinion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was just going to say that, in my judgment, it was a case exactly in point, and that the present bill does not confer upon the Executive any greater legislative power than was conferred by the various provisions of the tariff act to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is not a question of greater or less legislative power. Congress can not confer any legislative power upon the Executive. You might just as well offer a bill here that the inferior courts, which have been established by Congress under the Constitution, could rearrange their own jurisdiction, and that the judges of the circuit court of appeals and the district judges should meet together and take all the authority that Congress had ever conferred upon them, mix it up in a bowl, and redistribute it between the district court and the circuit court of appeals. Does anybody think you can confer legislative power upon the judicial branch of the Government? Does anybody think you can confer legislative power upon the executive branch of the Government? The executive branch of the Government has its well-defined duties under the Constitution. If Congress is willing, it can abdicate its functions and pass a bill that all the statutes Congress has ever enacted in relation to the executive department, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the Post Office Department, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Cabinet officials shall be thrown into a melting pot and the pot handed over to the President with his executive ladle to stir it up and ladle it out from time to time to such agencies, officials, officers, administrative commissions, and so forth, as he may from minute to minute take a whim to do. We have passed such laws for a hundred years as Congress has thought were necessary to guard the Treasury Department and the currency of this country. We have passed laws founding a great Federal Reserve Banking System in this country, and every bank and trust company is controlled by statutes that Congress made with a view of having them left there to control the Treasury Department. Now you are asked to say to the President that he may unscramble the whole business and those statutes and powers and cast down the limitations and checks and balances that we have erected, and that he may confer them upon the Comptroller of the Currency or the Food Commissioner.

My God! We are just entering this war. Is it necessary to change our whole form of government before we have begun to fight?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Did the Senator gather from the statement of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] that this power extends to the 12 reserve banks, which are governmental agencies, and that their business could be taken from any one of them and transferred to any one of these agencies?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I heard it, but it is so absurd that I paid no attention to it, really.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Could I not speak for half an hour on the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; but only 20 minutes on an amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And there is an amendment now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the rule laid down by the Vice President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will resume my remarks on the next amendment, if the Chair pleases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it has been suggested that if we should vote upon the pending amendment and then have no other amendment offered, there being no amendment before the Senate the 30 minutes rule will apply. At some time it must apply. I was rather surprised at the ruling of the Vice President. When we made this agreement I thought it meant that at any time during the progress of the debate, no matter whether it was the bill or an amendment which was before the Senate a Senator could use his 30 minutes, and it would be charged to him no matter when used.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will yield to me, I this morning tried to get the Senate to pass on this amendment so that the bill would be before the Senate if no one offered an amendment, with all the committee amendments out of the way, and Senators could speak on the bill for 30 minutes and 20 minutes thereafter on any amendment that was proposed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Anyone could offer an amendment at any time he saw fit, and if the ruling of the Chair is correct the 30 minutes allowed for debate upon the bill itself is postponed until there is not an amendment pending of any kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair recalls that always heretofore, when there has been a time limit, there has also been a unanimous-consent agreement to vote, so that those who delayed speaking on the bill were cut off; but under this unanimous-consent agreement, as there is no time fixed for a final vote on the bill, there will be an opportunity for everyone to speak for 30 minutes on the bill. The committee amendment is pending, and the Chair feels obliged to rule in accordance with the ruling of the Vice President, which was not appealed from.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was not appealed from, but I doubted its effect. I really did not catch its import when it was made. It is a matter that can easily be taken care of in subsequent unanimous-consent agreements, so that it will not be so material except in the present case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply want to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is speaking in the time of the Senator from Georgia, who has the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator from Georgia will be kind enough to yield for me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no complaint about the ruling of the Chair at all. The Chair may be entirely correct. While the technical matter before the Senate at the time was the amendment, I really was not speaking on the amendment; I was directing my remarks to the bill, and I assumed that I would have half an hour on the bill. But it makes no difference one way or the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may not have been aware of it, but he was speaking on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I agree with a number of Senators who feel that this amendment is not near so material as the amendments we intend to offer to the bill. I have spoken upon this amendment, but not within the 20 minutes' limit. I undertook to point out that the effect of the term "administrative" was to broaden very much the character of agencies that could be used by the President beyond the character limited by the word "executive," and I called attention to distinctions given by the Standard Dictionary between the word "administrative" as compared with the word "executive," applied to governmental officials. It is the view in all the dictionaries, I think, that the word "administrative" extends to officers beyond those who have some definite thing to execute and to any kind of agency connected with the administration. Therefore it will apply to most of the advisory committees, to the War Industries Board, the Food Control Commission, the War Finance Corporation, and to all the different agencies that can be or could be created.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understood from the Senator that it did not make much difference about this amendment, because that question will come up on the amendment the Senator proposes to introduce hereafter and also upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. Therefore the fight need not be made on this amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I simply called attention to what I considered to be the objectionable feature of the use of the word "administrative." I regarded it as vastly more important, however, to exempt entirely from the operation of the bill the Federal Reserve Board, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the War Finance Corporation, and agencies of that character that must be created by legislation under their present organization in order to maintain stability in the operation of the industries and the business of the country.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] read an extract from a paper this morning which criticized Congress for not acting more rapidly and closed by charging that Congress was about ceasing to function. My view is that the tendency of the Senate to cease to function grows out of the tendency to abandon and delegate its responsibilities to the President; that its fault has been not in taking too much time but in not taking time enough. When we appropriated $5,500,000,000 to new business undertakings in the War Department, if we had really taken time to consider what we were doing, and if we had taken time to consider that we were appropriating $3,000,000,000 to the War Department to be used by the Ordnance Bureau in the construction of plants for the manufacture of cannon and guns and powder, and in the construction of cannon and guns and powder, it would have occurred to us as we went on with the discussion—certainly to some one out of the 96—that we had provided no business men to conduct this enormous responsibility.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if Congress has any power to provide the man?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Congress could not have selected the man, but Congress could have provided that there should be created a commission or a man and broaden the authority from Army officers to civilians, and the very discussion of the subject, the very discussion of the need of a real man brought to the attention of the country, would in all probability have brought a man before 12 months had elapsed capable of handling the work.

Mr. KELLOGG. But, after all, the President is the only power to select the man.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is true, but what I am suggesting is this: One man can not meet the responsibility that we have placed on the President. One Senator or five Senators might not have done it, but if we had taken our time to discuss this subject, exercising our duty to prescribe rules and regulations for the government of the Army and the Navy, if we had directed that this money should be used through some kind of an agency suited to the work, if we had taken time, some one in the Senate would have thought of the necessity to provide a real organizing executive to direct the work.

How has the present action finally developed? It has really come to the country from the work of the Committee on Military Affairs. I am not complaining about the failure of any one person to do what might have been done; I am seeking to call attention to the fact that one person's mind can not do it, that one imagination can not reach it, and that the functioning of the Senate, though it takes some time, hastens wise action. The functioning of the Committee on Military Affairs beginning last fall has helped bring action. If we instead of hurrying when we appropriated the $5,500,000,000 had taken 30 days to discuss it, we would have probably saved 11 months in the proper use of the money.

I have taken occasion before to express my extreme gratification that we at last are to have a man who I believe measures up to the task of building ships. I do not know a great deal about it, but I have much confidence in the judgment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and what I hear of the new director of flying machine construction I like. I believe we are to have a man with organizing and administrative powers in charge of building fighting flying machines. I hope by some way we will get into the Ordnance Department a real business force to be conducted by men of independence and determination who will decline to be tied down by foolish red tape not prescribed by statute, but, as is all red tape, departmental rules and practice. There is not any red tape in the War Department prescribed by statute; it is simply red tape which lack of administrative force in administration has left there.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to ask the Senator if the power has not from the beginning of this war been lodged in the President to name the man who is to perform the function he has just described? Has he not the power?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator said that Congress had loaded upon the President more responsibility than any human mind could possibly discharge. Has the Senator had any intimation from the President that he has been overloaded?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was presenting my view of the subject and no one else's. I was presenting my own view, and I was suggesting to the Senate that instead of being frightened by these criticisms that we do not hurry, if we will take our time and consider these questions, their consideration by the Senate will help hurry up action elsewhere and cause more intelligent and more forceful and better action elsewhere. If we had really functioned as a Senate fixing rules and regulations for the government of the $5,500,000,000, if we had discussed what we expected done in the way of organization instead of responding to the demands for instant action, I believe the country would have saved many months that have been lost.

I shall not discuss at this time the Federal Reserve Board. I listened with deep interest to the statement of the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who openly declared that in his judgment this bill extended the power or the use of the Federal Reserve Board to any other agency, and maintained that the President ought to have the power to transfer the functions of this board.

He extended this view even to the 12 Federal reserve banks.

I am disposed to think the bill as drawn extends to 12 Federal reserve banks. They are governmental agencies in a sense. It may be and probably is that the right of private property invested in the reserve banks would make unconstitutional a provision passed by Congress which authorizes the President to take control of them, but the line of thought which the Senator from Colorado presented shows the menace to our Federal reserve banking system of the bill as it is drawn.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did not the Senator understand the Senator from Colorado to state that in practice the President could go to the Federal Reserve Board and make them remove the directors of the Federal reserve bank and put in others?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; it was his view that the bill gives that authority.

Mr. FALL. Conceding that the bill does give the authority to the President, or might be construed to give the authority to the President, to take over the property of the bank, even the private individual property of the bank, would that be more unconstitutional than the right sought to be given in what is known as the housing bill to take over the privately occupied dwelling of an individual?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the housing bill is very extreme. I have not voted for that provision and I have not determined to vote for it.

I think probably it might be best without any amendment presented for awhile to let each Senator who desires to use his 30 minutes discuss this entire bill. Then I expect to introduce some amendments. I expect to offer an amendment at the close of section 1:

Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall not extend to the functions, duties, or powers of the Federal Reserve Board.

If the Senate should see fit to adopt that amendment, then I shall offer an additional amendment adding the Interstate Commerce Commission, and adding such other special branches as can be offered, and test out the view of the Senate on the subject. I desire to remove entirely the civil establishment from the operation of the bill. I would vastly prefer that that should be done; but the great harm to the country which I see in the bill as it is drawn is the power to place in suspense or destroy the responsibility of the Federal reserve bank and the Interstate Commerce Commission. As to those two I think serious injury would be produced by the bill. I think the bulk of the changes if any take place in the other branches of our civil establishment will be mistakes if made at this time, when the war is on and when they will be made hurriedly. I do not think the changes will accomplish good. I think whatever is done will be harmful, but the great opportunity to do a serious injury, to impair the industries of the country and the banking system of the country, is found in the authority to disarrange the Federal reserve bank and the Interstate Commerce Commission. I consider a grevious danger carried in these two powers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 23, after the word "executive," insert the words "or administrative."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. Speeches under the 30-minute rule are now in order, unless an amendment is offered.

Mr. NELSON. There is another committee amendment following that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the amendments of the committee have now been adopted.

Mr. NELSON. The following amendment then has been adopted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am correct in the impression that all the committee amendments have been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is so informed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized to speak for 30 minutes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I intend in the very few minutes that I shall occupy to speak with reference to only one phase of the pending measure. Others will discuss it from different standpoints. That this bill unmodified and amended will confer upon the President the authority to transfer all the powers and functions which Congress has granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission to any other agency of the Government, whether that agency be a bureau, a department, a commission, or an officer existing by virtue of the statutes of the United States, must be admitted.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] expressed some doubt with regard to the scope of the bill or the interpretation of the bill in that regard, but he has not insisted very strongly upon his view in such respect. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is an agency of the Government created by Congress there can be no question. In my opinion, it is not only an agency of the Government, but it is both executive and administrative in its character.

When the Senator from Delaware was discussing the matter I asked him a question for which I ought to apologize. I asked him to define the term or word "executive" in this connection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the Senator from Iowa is in error. He asked that question, as I recall, of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. CUMMINS. I accept the correction of the Senator from Delaware. It was of the Senator from Tennessee that I asked the question.

Mr. MCKELLAR. My attention was diverted for the moment, and I did not hear the statement the Senator made. Will he repeat it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I stated that during the course of the observations of the Senator from Delaware—I now substitute the Senator from Tennessee, because I think the correction made by the Senator from Delaware is in accordance with the fact—I asked him to define the term "executive power" as used in the Constitution of the United States. I knew very well that he could not define it, for I do not think that any person can define it. I am quite sure that I would not attempt a definition myself, for there is no definition of that term that will not be found in collision with the practices of the Government or some practice of the Government in the last 125 years.

It is sufficient to say that there is a sense in which the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the Federal Reserve Board, or the Tariff Commission, or the Federal Farm-Loan Board is executive—that is to say, these governmental agencies attempt to carry into execution a law of Congress—but they are not executive in the sense in which we use the word when we refer to the executive department of the Government. The term as applied to them has come to mean those departments over which the President customarily exercises his power and which are closely and intimately related to the office of President of the United States. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is administrative in its work there can be no doubt whatsoever. The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly recognized and described it as an administrative body; and I intend, in my further discussion of the matter, to assume that the language in this bill will include the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Congress created the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purpose of insuring to the people of this country fair and reasonable rates for the transportation of their commerce, as well as to protect the railway or transportation systems of the United States against undue encroachments on their rights and privileges at the hands of the several Commonwealths of the Union. Anyone who is at all familiar with the history of our systems of regulation, both Federal and State, will have no doubt what the purpose was on the part of Congress. That was the first attempt, you will remember, of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. It preceded the further and, possibly, the more comprehensive attempt of the antitrust law which went into effect in 1890. The interstate-commerce law was passed, as you all know, in 1887. Congress created the Interstate Commerce Commission, prescribed the number of its membership, and reserved, as it must necessarily have reserved, the right to approve or reject the selections which the President might from time to time make in order to fill the offices that had thus been established. It is entirely and wholly an agency of Congress. While its duties are judicial in their general color and complexion, they are not judicial as determined or tested by the Constitution or by our general acceptance of that word.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely desire to ask the Senator a question. Does not the same view that the Senator has expressed about the Interstate Commerce Commission hold in regard to the Treasury Department of the Government—that it is peculiarly the agent of the Congress instead of the agent of the President?

Mr. CUMMINS. In a sense every agency of the Government is an agency of Congress; that is, if Congress creates the agency, that is true. It is not true, however, in the same sense that it is true with regard to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Inasmuch as the Treasury Department, however, has to do with the revenues of the Government, which are appropriated or raised altogether by Congress, is not the Secretary of the Treasury just as peculiarly an arm of the legislative branch of the Government as is the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not as peculiarly so. The office of Secretary of the Treasury is in large part ministerial. The duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission are not ministerial in any sense, for there is a vast difference between an executive act and a ministerial act. An executive act may involve the exercise of discretion; a ministerial act can not ordinarily involve the exercise of discretion. But it matters not if there is a close parallel between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Interstate Commerce Commission, my argument remains the same. Congress created the Interstate Commerce Commission; it prescribed its membership; it carefully defined its duties and powers, all for the purpose of protecting the people. Congress would not have passed a law giving these powers and duties to a single person. They are too vital to the welfare of the country, and they are of a character that could not possibly be safely exercised by a single person.

Suppose we had before us at this moment a bill which proposed to transfer all the powers and the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission to a single person; assume further that that person is the Director General of Railways, under the law which we passed a few weeks ago; is there a single Senator here or elsewhere who would vote for a bill which would take from nine men trained in the subject over which they are given power, skilled in the intricacies of transportation, who through years of experience have become familiar with the needs and demands of the various localities of the country—would you, I ask the Senator from Tennessee, if such a bill were present here now transferring all these powers and duties from a board of nine men, composed as I have suggested, to a single man, no matter how honest he might be? Would you vote to entrust to any one man these vast and intricate and vital powers for the government and control of our transportation—not the transportation of Government material or of Government troops, but the transprtation upon which the commerce of the country and the industry of the people are founded? Would the Senator from Tennessee vote for such a bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I would not vote for a bill of that kind, but this bill applies only to a temporary situation. As a matter of fact, I think the Senator from Iowa and I have both already voted for a law that practically does the same thing in the recent railroad bill, which was passed by this body—I will not say the Senator voted for it—but it was passed, I think, practically by unanimous consent. However, I want to ask the Senator this question: Suppose since the Government has taken over the railroads and has put them in the hands of a Director General, the President should conclude that these nine experts, or some of them, could be well utilized in aiding the Director General in carrying on the railroad business of the country as conducted by the Government, does not the Senator think that the President ought to have the right to utilize the services of these well-known railroad experts in aiding the Government in carrying on this great branch of governmental endeavor at this time?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all this bill does.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that is not all of this bill. That is the difficulty about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what can be done under this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the fallacy about the argument of those who are advocating the passage of this bill unchanged. Of course, that could be done, but that is not all that could be done; it is a very small part of the powers which are proposed to be conferred in the bill.

I have no objection to authorizing the President—he has the power now—to call upon the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission for all the information they have. Not three months ago the President invoked the services of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the composition of the railway bill, to which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has referred, and they rendered all the aid which men could render in framing and preparing and presenting the measure which we passed.

But I want again to correct the Senator from Tennessee. I did not vote for the railway bill. That is one of the sins that can never be laid at my door. I was quite willing that the President should be in possession of the railroads; I think he ought to have taken possession of them long before he did; but the railway bill which we passed contained so many objectionable provisions which could not possibly be employed for either the prosecution of the war or for the advantage of the people that I could not vote for it, knowing that the President already had full and complete authority, so far as the operation of the property and the utilization of all of the resources of transportation were concerned.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa and of the Senator from Tennessee to the provision of the law which we passed, which is known as the railroad law. It authorizes the President to "avail himself of the advice, assistance, and cooperation of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the members and employees thereof," and he "may also call upon any department, commission, or board of the Government for such services as he may deem expedient."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to the Senator from Minnesota for calling that matter specifically to the attention not only of the Senator from Tennessee but to the attention of all Senators. This bill can not be defended upon any such pretense as the desire on the part of the President or the Director General of Railroads to secure information that may be lodged in the Interstate Commerce Commission, or for aid that he may require from any member of that commission. He has that right now, as he has always had it.

It is not true, as seems to be supposed by so many Senators, that we have entirely emasculated and destroyed the Interstate Commerce Commission in the railroad law, objectionable as some of the provisions of that law may be. I am afraid to go any further, however, in that direction. If you think you are safe in transferring the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission to a single person, see what is being done now. The Senate, on the passage of that bill through this body, attached an amendment to it that preserved from the operation of the bill, if that were necessary, the right of the several States to tax these properties in their accustomed manner.

There was added to that amendment in conference, as I remember, a provision which practically nullified it, although in the hands of a competent and unprejudiced board it might still have effected the things which were intended by the author of the amendment. What has happened now? The Director General has addressed, according to the public press, the governor of every State in the Union upon the subject of taxation, and has asked the governors to use their influence, not to retain taxation of the railroads at the present point, but to reduce the taxes which have heretofore been levied upon these properties by the several States. Why? In order to increase the net revenue of these properties, which it is hoped may finally find its way into the Treasury of the United States. If this persuasion which has now been initiated shall be unavailing, mark my word, it will not be six months until the Director General will be using the power which we gave to him in that bill to destroy the systems of taxation of the several States. What does that mean? It means that the people of the various Commonwealths, deprived of the revenue which they have heretofore enjoyed from this source, must increase the burdens laid upon other kinds of property.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this bill would not change that situation, would it?

Mr. CUMMINS. It would not; I am simply trying to point out the dangers that are to be feared in the transfer of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to any single man, I care not how honest he may be. He will be a man with an obsession, he will be a man with something to accomplish; it may be right and it may be wrong; but I, for one, will never vote to grant any such power to a single man. The experience of the whole world has repudiated ventures of that character. I mention this simply to point out the things that may be apprehended in the future administration of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. OVERMAN. Wherein is that power granted of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad to read it to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator refer to the railroad bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is in the railroad bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, I thought the Senator was referring to the pending bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The power granted in this bill is to take the authority away from the nine men who have been lifted up by the President himself as men fit to administer this law. I do not agree with him in regard to all these men, for I think some of them ought not to have been appointed; but, as a whole, they constitute the safest depositary of the power which we desire to grant that can possibly be conceived.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not conceive how, under the railroad bill, that can be done, and I should like the Senator to read the provision; or if there is some other bill which the Senate has passed that would give the power to the Government to increase taxes in the States, I should like to know about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have just answered the Senator from Idaho that the bill we are now considering does not change that.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator says the power is somewhere else. I should like to know where it is, because if the Senate passed a bill with any such provision in it, I should like to know it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will read the provision in the railroad bill. It is section 15, and reads as follows:

> That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation or the lawful police regulations of the several States, except—

As I remember, this is what was added—> except wherein such laws, powers, or regulations may affect the transportation of troops, war materials, Government supplies, or the issue of stocks and bonds.

Mr. McKELLAR rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very sorry, but I can not yield for any extended discussion, because my time is limited.

Mr. President, it will not be long until the Director General of Railways will say to the States, "Your taxation of these instrumentalities interferes with the issue of stocks and bonds, or interferes with the efficiency of the railroads in rendering the Government service, and for that reason we set aside the several laws of the States relating to taxation." It may not occur; but I am not willing—and I was not willing originally—to vote to make it possible that such a contingency should arise, especially as no one has ever pointed out or ever can point out any safety for this country with the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission in one man's hands that does not exist in the hands of the nine men who constitute the commission.

I pass from that to what is left with the Interstate Commerce Commission and what we are asked to authorize the President to take away and confer upon any person whom he may select. Section 10 of the railway act begins:

> That carriers while under Federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under State or Federal laws or at common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control or with any order of the President.

It is my opinion that the power of the President over the subject as granted in the railway law does not embrace the power and duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to proceed with its valuation of railway property. At this time that power is secure; at this time that duty is complete; and, if Congress makes the appropriations necessary to enable the commission to go forward, the work which has been pursued for the last three years and a half or more will go on; and when we come to resume the discussion of the real and proper relation between the Government of the United States and these railways, when we come to ascertain whether we shall become the owner of these vast properties or whether we shall redivide and reconstruct the systems in order to eliminate some of the difficult problems which have grown up under our former system of regulation, we will have not, it is true, a valuation in its proper sense, but we will have collected all of the information necessary to reach a conclusion with respect to the true value of the properties. It makes no difference whether the Government becomes the owner or whether it undertakes some other plan of regulation and control, the value of the properties is of the highest importance; it is an essential element, in any consideration, which we may give to this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as I was saying a few moments ago when I was speaking upon the committee amendment, I regard the pending bill as a clear attempt to delegate legislative power to the executive branch of the Government; hence, I regard it as utterly unconstitutional, and I think the Supreme Court will set it aside as soon as it can properly be brought before it if we should pass the bill.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has indicated that he is to offer several amendments to the bill, and if I understand the purport of the amendments I shall certainly advocate them and vote for them; but even then, Mr. President, I regard it as perilous to pass this bill. It is wrong in principle. It will not make any difference how many amendments the Senate puts onto this bill. If any Senator thinks that he is going to help defeat this bill by putting some amendments on it and making it a little less objectionable, he is pursuing a vain hope. If the Senate adopts any amendments to this bill, they will simply furnish the conference committee a handle with which to strike out all the amendments of the Senate to the bill, and the bill will be reported right back here from the conference committee just as it was drawn by the President, and then we will have to swallow it whole or reject it in toto; that is all there is to it. So that no one will accomplish anything, even if he gets proper amendments attached to the bill. The one amendment that ought to be offered and carried to this bill is to strike out all after the enacting clause. Then we should know where we stand.

Has any Member of either branch of Congress the slightest idea what use the President would make of this vast power which we propose to hand to him en bloc, to carve up into such sized cubes as his whim may from minute to minute dictate? No one knows a single thing that he intends to do. Does he know himself? He says he does not. I think I violate no confidence when I state to the Senate and to the country that the Committee on the Judiciary that considered the bill for weeks with the strongest opposition developing there, sent a committee of its members or certain individual members of the committee to ask the President if he would not be kind enough to inform us what he wanted to do; and the answer came back that he was unable to do so, because he did not know what he wanted to do. He wanted the power to do anything that he might want to do in the future; and since then it has come to my ears unofficially that he has been sending for Senators and notifying them formally that he would regard the vote of any Senator against this bill just as it is drawn here as a vote of a lack of confidence in him!

Well, now, the President has his veto power. Having that, it does not seem to me to be quite seemly that he should not only draw bills in advance and send them over here with orders to pass them without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," but that he should accompany them with a notice that if any Senator ventures to have a different opinion of the legality of a measure from his opinion he will regard it as a vote of lack of confidence in him.

I noticed in that great palladium of our liberties, the New York World, yesterday or day before yesterday, an article by the Washington correspondent of that literary production in which it was said that the President demanded to know the names of the Senators who were going to vote against this bill. He demanded to know their names! Well, all he has to do is to read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and he will find out quickly enough. There will be a roll call on the bill, probably. I do not know of any Senator who is afraid to have his name go in, no matter which way he is going to vote on the bill.

Why does not the President specify what he wants to do? What is the hindrance that is placed now upon the executive branch of the Government? Who appoints these fellows that are inefficient and are duplicating work? Why, they are all his agents now. He can chop off their heads at any minute. Many of them were confirmed over strong protest in the Senate; but they are his agents, and he can remove them. He says they do not coordinate. Why does he not make them coordinate? He is their boss. He can summon the heads of any executive department or of any bureau or of any commission into his office and say: "You gentlemen are not coordinating. Now, coordinate. Go ahead and coordinate. If you do not, I will do some coordinating, and off your heads will go." What is the use of his complaining to us that he can not make his own servants obey his orders or carry out his own policies?

We are asked now to put in escrow all the powers that Congress has ever granted to any executive department, commission, agency, or officer, tie them up in one bag, and hand them over to the President for him to do with as he may see fit from minute to minute, so that if he confers the powers of the Comptroller of the Currency upon the Food Commissioner and that official makes a blunder which causes public clamor and criticism, and somebody gets up in Congress and attempts to criticize him or to show wherein he is acting wrongly, the President says: "Ah! The pea is under the other shell. I took it away from him an hour and a half ago, and have now conferred it upon Dr. Garfield"; and there would be no possible way in which this free democracy and this republican form of government could ever find who was responsible, except we know in a general way that the President would be responsible, because he would hold the bag, with all the powers in it.

But they say: "You must not criticize the President"; and I have just read in the newspaper an article in which the Associated Press says you must not criticize the President during war. The Senator from Illinois, the distinguished mold of fashion, stands up here and ululates and bleats, "We are at war, and he is our Commander in Chief! He must have all the power necessary to win the war."

Well, the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He is not commander in chief of Congress, and he is not commander in chief of the American people. We are not yet under military rule, and I do not think we shall be. But here is the Democratic Party, in complete control of all three branches of this Government, the party that has stood up preaching the faith of its sanctified leader, Thomas Jefferson, for 75 years here, denouncing the concentration of power at Washington and claiming that they were for the rule of the people and home rule, proposing to confer upon the President of the United States, simply because he is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and can order vessels around and order generals around, the power to reorganize all the executive departments of this Government. Why, it is an amazing, an astounding, an utterly unheard-of and utterly unnecessary thing to pass.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], I believe, a member of the Judiciary Committee, went over to see the President about this bill, and tried to find out what the President had in mind. He could not find out anything about it, except that the President said: "I want the power. I do not know what I am going to do with it; I do not know that I shall do anything with it, but I want the power."

Well, if Congress abdicates all its functions and turns over all its powers to the executive branch of the Government and then adjourns, how much do you think you are going to know about this war? Is not the Congress of the United States a part of the Government of the United States? Or have the people actually come to believe that the Executive is the Government of the United States?

Why, the President of the United States now is more powerful than any monarch in the world. Nobody knows what will be done with these powers. Why should we pass a bill under the plain language of which the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission could be transferred to the Director of Railroads? Why should we pass a bill the language of which would permit the powers of the Federal Reserve Board to be transferred to the Department of the Interior? Is there any excuse for it?

"Ah," they say, "you distrust the President." Why, Mr. President, if somebody introduced a bill here providing that in the future the President could make all the appropriations needed by the Army and Navy, and somebody should object to it, they would say: "Ah, you distrust the President."

I do not distrust the President. I know that he is a patriotic, loyal American. I distrust his judgment of men, Mr. President; and I think his selection of men has warranted my distrust. I do not think he is a good judge of men. I think he has made some egregious blunders; but I do not distrust the President's integrity, nor his patriotism. I simply know that he is human. He is not infallible. Why bundle up all these powers and hand them to him?

If such a fundamental bill as this is necessary, why should not the President write a message to Congress and tell us why it is necessary? Why write a letter to a particular Senator, and hand him the bill, and say: "Get this through, and anybody that does not vote for it is my enemy"? Here is a great measure. We do not hear one word from the Chief Executive about it. He sends for some one Senator, or writes some Senator a letter, and says: "Go to it, and put it through. I will not have any amendments to it. I do not care what the discussion in the Senate is; it is all trivial. Hurry up—for God's sake, hurry up—and give me the power."

Is that what the President means by taking common council with Congress? Is that what he means when he complains of a lack of coordination? Is it reasonable? Is it fair?

Here is the legislative branch of the Government, with its organized committees and its lawyers and business men and its men representative of the people who sent them here, just as much as the President is a representative of the people. We represent the particular sections, and we are selected because our constituents have confidence in us. There is not a Senator on this floor who ever got to the United States Senate unless there was something in him, unless the majority, at least, of his people trusted him. We are all elected by the people themselves now, and not by legislatures. Is it so that argument and debate are to be foreclosed, that bills are to be drawn by Deputy Attorneys General and chiefs of departments and sent over here with an "O. K.; pass this," signed by the President, with orders to vote down all amendments before they are offered, or before it is known what they are? Is that taking common counsel and coordination?

We have three coordinate branches of this Government, and they ought to coordinate. That was the intention of the framers of the Constitution. When the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] the other day, in a magnificent speech, in which he had the goods and the testimony of the living witnesses from the primary authority, stood up here and exposed certain defects and inefficiencies in the War Department, the President of his own political party, the Commander in Chief, denounced him as a liar. He said he had committed a willful distortion of the truth; and then, by some intellectual process of jugglery of which he is a master, he stated that therefore he was compelled to assume that he was against all his policies. Is that a good exhibition to make to the country of coordinating? The Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the great Military Affairs Committee, is responsible for every piece of effective war legislation that has gone through this Congress. If it had not been for him, we would not have had any Army; and yet his Commander in Chief treats him in that way, and calls it taking common counsel and coordinating! He assumes the right to criticize us. I reserve the right to criticize him when I think he needs it, although the Associated Press may not dare to do so.

The administration has pretty nearly got the country by the throat. It controls all the banks and trust companies through the Federal Reserve Board. It controls the whole shipbuilding industry. It controls all the railroads of the country through the Director of Railroads. It controls the food of the country through the Food Administration. It controls the production of the country by fixing the prices of wheat and other farm products. It controls the coal mines and the fuel of the country, and now we are asked to sign a blank deed and hand it over to the President to control everything and everybody in all the executive departments, and to redefine their jurisdiction!

Why, we have carefully attempted in statutes for a hundred years to put certain limitations and checks upon certain departments, and then, when the President has named his chief for the head of one of those departments and sends him over here, we have confirmed that man to administer those duties because in our opinion he had special fitness for those duties. Now, the President wants power to take all of one group of duties and bestow those duties and powers upon a man that the Senate never confirmed at all for that position. I might be willing to confirm Dr. Garfield for a fuel administrator, but it does not follow from that that I ought to hand the President a written power of attorney to make him Secretary of the Treasury at any time he wanted to, because he might not make a good Secretary of the Treasury. In other words, by a process of indirection, the provisions of this bill deprive the Senate of its constitutional right to confirm the heads of the executive departments and bureaus and commissions of this Government; and we seem to be proud to divest ourselves, or to attempt to divest ourselves, of the powers that the Constitution confers upon Congress.

I do not propose to be a Senator like a little white poodle dog or a spaniel running between the White House and the Capitol with a ball in my mouth and carrying orders back and forth, or delivering them. We are Senators of the United States, and our responsibility is just as heavy and our action is just as important as that of the executive departments. If any Senator or any Member of the House feels at times humiliated by the criticisms of Congress in the newspapers, and the jokes that are made upon it, and the denunciations that are rained upon it for its impotency and its lack of independence and originality and backbone, it is our own fault because men will not stand up and vote their honest convictions. I will venture to say that there are not one-third of the Senators on the Democratic side of this Chamber who in their hearts are proud to vote for this bill, or believe that it is a good bill to pass, and yet they line up and vote for it—why? Because they want to stand in with the administration; because they do not want the President to send a telegram down through Mr. Tumulty or somebody to the Democratic committee, or through Mr. Vance McCormick, and say: "Send me up a man who will be good and do just as I tell him to. I can not manage this fellow. Send me up somebody that will be a cuckoo." That is the reason why they are going to vote for it. A government of the people and by the people, a great democracy of 100,000,000 free men, all come to heel just like a lot of little trained dogs in a dog show.

This sort of thing makes me sick, Mr. President, and I will not vote for the bill in any form.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is my purpose to offer, a little later, the following amendment:

Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall not extend to the functions, duties, or powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Reserve Board.

In offering that amendment I do not wish to be understood as meaning that the bill would be perfect if that amendment were adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia offer the amendment now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not yet. I am simply explaining that I intend to do so later. I wanted it understood, however, before I offered the amendment, that I did so because I thought it would take two of the most objectionable features out of the bill, not that the bill would cease to be objectionable.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has called our attention to the fact that the Constitution provides that all but the inferior officers are to be nominated by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I do not know just what that means. Certainly some officers are not inferior officers. By this bill we propose to transfer, at the will of the President, the responsibilities of every major office to anybody he may name, though the new recipient of the duties was never confirmed by the Senate. I do not say it is unconstitutional. I do not know how far Congress can go in abdicating its responsibilities without passing unconstitutional legislation. I only know that for one I will not vote for such a measure, constitutional or unconstitutional.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I take it that the measure would be just as unconstitutional after the adoption of the Senator's amendment as before.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but it would not be as dangerous to the country, for the reason that while there may be disturbances of government caused by it in spots, if you preserve the Federal Reserve Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission in my opinion you save from injury the banking system of the country and the industries of the Nation.

Mr. BORAH. The situation has resolved itself, then, into this, that it is a question of expediency as to how much we shall include rather than a question of the constitutional principle whether or not the bill should pass at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say that I thought the bill was unconstitutional, even as it is.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that the Senator has said so; but a number of Senators have advanced the theory that it is unconstitutional, but seemed to indicate that if certain amendments were adopted they would accept it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not speak for them. I am speaking for myself. I have just said that I did not know how far Congress could go, in the transfer of responsibilities that the Constitution certainly authorized Congress to perform, without making the legislation itself unconstitutional. The Supreme Court has held that measures that went very far in the delegation of what might be construed as legislative responsibilities were not unconstitutional; and I have no fixed opinion as to where the power of delegation ends, if it ends anywhere, except in the discretion of Congress itself. Therefore, as to that question, the Senator from Idaho will have to ask some other Senator. What I am urging is that the worst part of this delegation is that delegation which reaches to agencies that are the most far-reaching in our industrial and commercial life.

The President might carry out the suggestions contained in the memorandum of the Senator from North Carolina, and consolidate certain features of the Agricultural Department with the office of Commissioner of Education. It would be a blunder, it would be foolish; but it would not strike at our industrial or commercial life. It would be a mistake that would soon be rectified. He might follow the suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee and undertake to consolidate our Federal Trade Commission with a somewhat similar branch in the Department of Commerce. They are engaged in different work. The work is specialized and different in the two bureaus. I think it would be a blunder to make the consolidation, but it would not reach our industrial and our commercial life. It would be a less important blunder than to tear to pieces our Federal Reserve Board and our Interstate Commerce Commission.

The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] frankly stated upon the floor that he favored giving the right to the President to interfere with the Federal Reserve Board. The act creating the board gives him the right to remove its members at pleasure; but when he makes a removal he must send another name to the Senate for confirmation, and we exercise our responsibility in saying whether the proposed new member is suitable. But this bill would let the President take all the duties of the Federal Reserve Board, which we have so carefully guarded in our banking and currency legislation, and transfer them to the Comptroller of the Currency or to an auditor of the Treasury Department. The Senator from Colorado goes further and says that the 12 Federal reserve banks are administrative agencies, and that the President would have the right to name the directors of any one of those banks, or name some other Government agent to operate them. I do not say that I accept that view, but I mention it to show you what an able lawyer and a great Senator thinks could be done. The men around the President might take the same position.

Why do I say that jeopardizes the commerce of the country? Because the banks of the United States have conducted their business, continuing and expanding credits and functioned during the war just as well as they did in peace, relying with confidence upon the organization we created and upon the officers of the Federal Reserve Board. If the views of the Senator from Colorado should be executed, the whole banking system of the country would be jarred from ocean to ocean, and you would see a curtailment of credits and a running to cover by the banks everywhere, in fear that wreck and ruin was ahead of them. Instead of the superb response to the needs of the country, which the banks have been giving for 12 months past, you would force them into contraction, you would force them to bring on liquidation, and you would break down the banking system and the credits of our country.

Senators, are we to vote for a bill with such a provision in it because any President has demanded it? I would tear up my commission and go home before I would deal such a blow to my country. Whip the Germans? No man lives who desires to whip the Germans more than I do. I would rather see this country of ours sunk 500 feet below sea level, and the oceans sweeping together over us all, than to have the Prussians treat the American people as they have treated the Belgians. I would rather wipe out whatever I have, and bury all my children and grandchildren and relatives, than to submit to the domination of the brutal Hun. It is because I wish to whip the Germans, it is because I know that the strength of my country must be maintained to whip them, that I oppose this unwise—to state it mildly—this inexcusable proposition to involve the entire banking system of our country in a state of uncertainty and doubt and almost ruin.

Now, when we come to the Interstate Commerce Commission there is still retained in that commission a power to hear and reverse action by the railroad managers; at least, there is a semijudicial tribunal, perhaps a legislative commission, charged with giving a party injured a formal hearing. Just what the Interstate Commerce Commission is I do not know. It is partly judicial, partly legislative, and partly administrative. It is a creation by Congress to perform a duty that rests upon Congress. But it has been created with certain limitations and directions which require from it the exercise of our congressional authority to pass upon facts and questions of law in a semijudicial way.

What is our Interstate Commerce Commission? A board of nine men, a number of whom have been upon it for years. They have been confirmed by the Senate. They have been studying the question of discriminatory rates for years. As a part of their force there are many examiners who have been trained for years, many of them having come up from civil-service clerks, who are now receiving $5,000 a year as assistants. It is an organized, trained body of men charged with responsibility by the Congress of the United States—the lawmaking power in this country. What is it that is proposed? That we shall let the President name anybody he sees fit, man or woman, if a Government officer or agency, to perform the duties that we have placed upon this great tribunal. Why? To win the war. How win the war? What does the President know about it that the Senate does not?

There are a dozen men in the Senate who know more about the Interstate Commerce Commission and its duties than the President or any man who ever was President. I would not trust any one Senator here alone to transfer the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission; I would not transfer that authority to the entire Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate. If a change takes place in the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission I wish it to come before Congress as a legislative measure and let it be considered by both bodies of Congress. That is the wise and constitutional course.

What change does the President wish to make in the Federal Reserve Board or the Interstate Commerce Commission? We have begged the Judiciary Committee to send and find out. We have begged them to obtain information. The answer we got was no. Things for change come up every day. We were told that was all the answer we could get. What has come up in the past 12 months during the war which should be changed? We received no answer. What kind of men are we that we lay down our responsibility at the mere bidding without explanation and without information?

Oh, yes; we got information and explanation. The Senator from North Carolina told us all about it. He said it was to win the war. Just as logically he could ask the Senator from Connecticut to crawl around this room to win this war. There would be just as much reason to believe it would win the war as that conferring power upon the President to interfere with the civil establishment would win the the war. There is not a reason why; there is not an indication how.

Gentlemen, are we to jeopardize the industrial and commercial interests of our country without knowing why? I invite you to point out a change that should take place in either of these organizations. I invite those who represent the President to tell us, to treat us with respect, to regard our capacity as legislators. If we pass this bill as it is, we ought not to have any respect from any source; if we abandon our legislative responsibilities and say "take it all, do as you please," we would say to the President you know more about their duties than both Houses of Congress, or perhaps even we would say Dr. Garfield knows more than Congress.

The country ought to lose respect for all such legislators. We can not do it, gentlemen. If that is the kind of legislation that is to be done, if that is what my people want, I wish them to put somebody else in my place. I know it will hurt our country if the President tinkers with either of those two organizations. Either he is going to or he is not going to. If he is not going to, there is no use to put them in the bill; and if he is intending to interfere with them, I know he will hurt my country and help the Germans, and I protest against their being included in the bill.

I can not, therefore, as a loyal citizen of the United States, desiring more the defeat of the Germans than anything else, consent to jeopardize the industries and the commerce necessary to aid in this war just because there is a bill here containing that provision. The Senator from North Carolina has been commended for objecting to any amendment. Senators, what will the country think of us if we do it? What will we deserve to have all men think of us? Either that we do not think or we would not think.

I hope, therefore, that a little later on when I offer these amendments they may receive from the Senate a majority, protecting the bill from the things that will do the most harm and that will help the Germans most. The balance of the bill may inconvenience us and disarrange some of our domestic affairs, but I am not sure that any of the other changes will help the Germans win the war. I use the eloquent and vigorous language of the Senator from North Carolina. I only wish the Senate to understand that in offering the amendment which I shall do a little later I do not in any sense mean that I think it is all that ought to be done. I only mean that I think it is absolutely essential that these of our executive organizations should be freed from the danger of change without legislative consideration.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, some day I am minded to take into my confidence the American people and tell them what I think about some of the Members of the Senate. I am not going to do it to-day, however, but I am going to address myself to this bill and briefly. I spoke in favor of it on February 15, and certainly it can not be said that the Senate has been proceeding without careful deliberation or with undue or unnecessary haste. But the time has come when this bill ought to be passed. As one of the Senators said the other day, the time for peace talk has ended. It ended on the day when war was declared, and the time for prolonged discussion in the United States Senate that unnecessarily obstructs the passage of war legislation is also about past.

It seems to me that some of the Senators who were so swift to declare the war are laying down on the fight when it becomes necessary here to pass some legislation that the administration and all others acquainted with the conditions have regarded necessary for the successful prosecution of the war.

Some have said, What is the necessity for this legislation? Let us see. We have in our war establishment or in our machinery for conducting war several different boards and agencies. We have the Shipping Board, that is authorized to buy steel, that needs steel urgently, and that has the money to pay for it. We have a like agency in the War Department and in the Navy Department and the railroad department, all agencies of the Government. Now, all that need steel have authority to buy steel and all have the money to buy with.

Now, what is the condition? The supply of steel is limited. Who is there to say what particular one of these departments shall have what steel is on hand or what shall be paid for it? Nobody. There is no man, no governmental agency, in the United States to-day that can act by direct legislative authority to the exclusion of any other agency in the purchase of steel. There is an example, and that is a condition that is intended to be remedied by this bill.

The Secretary of War thought in building this machine this sort of condition might be avoided; that we might not duplicate effort; that we might eliminate competition among Government agencies and save the Government money; that we might say to one particular agency, "Your need is more urgent than that of the others, and you shall have the steel." He thought that condition might be brought about by the War Industries Board at the top of all these organizations, a voluntary organization, mind you, because all members of that organization are heads of departments under the direct authority of the President and may be removed by him. He thought by conference and adjustment and agreement that all such conditions might be remedied.

But what was the result? We had a great long tirade and unsparing criticism from the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. We had another from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. We had another from the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of our Military Affairs Committee, and yet another from the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

What said these Senators? They said it was impossible with this sort of an organization to conduct the war successfully; that there was a lack of concrete power, a lack of singleness of purpose, a lack of unity of action; that there was diversity of authority and loss of power; and that we must have some statutory, some direct and express authority in order to have this condition remedied. They proposed a minister-of-munitions bill. They proposed a war-cabinet bill. To this minister of munitions and to this war cabinet they gave all the powers and more than are proposed to be granted to the President here. Some of the powers proposed to be granted in the latter bill would have taken the conduct or direction of the war virtually out of the President's control and necessarily hindered and obstructed him in carrying on the war. If any one of them denies that let him stand up now and say so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I deny it. There was nothing in the war-cabinet bill and there was nothing in the director-of-munitions bill which would authorize taking away from the Interstate Commerce Commission any of its functions.

Mr. KIRBY. And there is nothing in this bill which authorizes taking away from the Interstate Commerce Commission any of its functions. It is true the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has seen fit to convince himself that there is a great bogy in this bill along that line. He has erected a mighty straw man here in proportions grand and tall, and he has punched him full of holes and torn him down and trampled him into the dust, but the inference that he draws is not warranted. It is not within the scope of this bill.

The distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], a great lawyer, who understands the working of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and all of us agree that it is of great benefit in this Government of ours and has protected the people against extortion and outrage and robbery by our railroads, corporations, and common carriers; we all agree to that; but that Senator, great lawyer as he is, will not dare stand on this floor and say that the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to review a rate, to determine the reasonableness of it, is an executive or an administrative function, and only the agencies whose functions are executive or administrative can be affected by this bill. Now, that is the condition we find here. We can conjure up these things, we can say they are wrong as conjured up, but let a Senator point out where this bill will do it. It can not be done.

These other gentlemen have said we needed some unity of action, some direct express authority to do these things, to coordinate these agencies; and Willard, who was chairman of the National Council of Defense, a great railroad president; this man Gifford, who was secretary and statistician for the council; Catchings, who was the chairman of the United States Chamber of Commerce, each and every one of them, and two others, whose names I do not recall, the great men who were here and saw this organization as it was builded up, saw this agency increased here, saw one added over there, said it might be improved only in one way. How? By creating some authority that would be plenary; that would be concrete and elastic; that could be directly used by the President; that where there was shown to be conflict or friction it might be removed with this additional authority or this express elastic authority; that where there was shown to be slack in the operation of the machine, that slack might be taken up; that where it was not operating as smoothly as it might or with as much celerity as it should, that might be increased and more power added to it. It is like you had a great train to cross the mountains. You might not be able to carry it over with one engine, but you would not want two engines to go across the continent with that train only to help over the mountains when the condition arose and the necessity for the use of the second engine.

It is like a lighting plant here in the city; when it gets to the point where the usual power will not carry the peak of the load, you hang on another dynamo. You use the power where the power is needed and when it is needed. That is the purpose of this bill.

The Senator from Georgia has said, as has the Senator from Connecticut, that we do not want to destroy all the agencies that have been created from the beginning of the United States up to now; that Congress in its wisdom has thought that this broad executive power that has been granted to the President should be exercised in certain ways, and provided by laws, vehicles, procedures, and methods for its exercise. The Senator says we do not want to destroy all these vehicles; we do not want to destroy all these methods which the Congress in its wisdom has devised. That is true. We do not want to destroy them, and this bill provides the only method whereby we can have the additional concentrated power so imperatively needed without destroying them. If you pass a bill providing for a minister of munitions and give him certain duties and powers, it would necessarily repeal all other laws that affect that subject and are in conflict with the act, and destroy to that extent all former agencies exercising that authority. If you pass the other bill, the war-cabinet bill, it would do likewise, and there would be no authority remaining for the exercise of such powers except as contained in that particular bill.

This bill in its operation leaves all the existing agencies in the exercise of their proper functions when they are discharging them as they ought to be discharged, and only in case the necessity arises and the thing needed to be done can not be done to the interest of the Government by the agency in its accustomed operation is it expected that this authority will be used to change conditions and to improve them. Then, when the war is over and the need for the exercise of the power granted in this bill is ended, all the agencies affected by it immediately snap back to their present positions, to continue the exercise of their powers and functions as formerly under existing laws, that have at most only been suspended during the war and not repealed or abrogated by the passage of this bill.

Now, what is there so radically wrong about that proposition? There is nothing in this bill, I maintain, that can possibly affect the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks or that will affect the operation of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

You know that the President has already been given authority to initiate rates and that they may be put into effect or inaugurated without the review by the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine whether they are reasonable as has always obtained heretofore. That authority has already been expressly granted, and certainly there is no need to confer it by or infer it from this bill. The other authority can not be withdrawn from the agency where it is placed—the Interstate Commerce Commission—the right to review and to declare reasonableness of rates, because its exercise is a judicial function and not an executive or administrative function, which latter only can be affected by the passage of this bill.

I am not going to talk longer, as I spoke on the subject two months ago. There may be a wide misunderstanding about the purpose and effect of the measure, but from the way some Senators have talked about it here to-day there is no occasion for it; and I want to say here now that I shall expect, as he has already indicated he will do, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to support it. I shall expect the Senator from Nebraska, who has said we need a minister of munitions and need a war-cabinet bill to support this measure. I shall expect likewise the two distinguished Republican Senators who have insisted that such legislation alone can save the War Department from being absolutely puerile and useless to support this bill, because it contains the same grant of power, elastic power, and the right to use these agencies that all these gentlemen have said must be given before there was a probability of a successful conduct of the war.

I do not believe that any Senator here expects that we shall be other than successful in waging this war against the Germans yonder. I believe it is the purpose of every true American to stand by the flag of the country and that it shall be borne on to victory yonder. I think the best thing Congress can do at this time is to have regard for necessary war legislation and to pass it without too much delay. I think it should speedily finish up the appropriation bills. It should pass a revenue bill that would increase the revenue $2,000,000,000 a year, say. Then I believe we ought to go home and let the executive departments wage this war. Let them conduct the war. Let them deliver the blow with the Army that this machine has been here lately in process of raising and organizing. Congress can not direct the fight, and it is about time we got down to realize that fact and put all the instruments that can be possibly used at the disposal of the other departments and let the war go on.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. As I take it, the Senator himself—and I was in that class—was opposed to the so-called munitions bill and the war-cabinet bill.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has just argued that those who favored those bills, for the reason they favored them, ought to favor this measure. Would it not follow that he and I ought for the same reason to oppose this bill?

Mr. KIRBY. My only reason for objecting to some of the matters in the munitions bill and the war-cabinet bill was because the Secretary of War said we had eliminated the difficulty by putting these other fellows at the top here; that since we have the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and the other men at the top of all these departments in the War Industries Board, and since the President is supreme over all and can remove any of them, he believed by that indirect power and pressure the situation could be controlled.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, then what is the use of this bill?

Mr. KIRBY. The Secretary of War has concluded there is necessity for it, and the President has found since he has gone along that it can not be done so well. Take the matter of buying steel——

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Secretary of War was wrong in the other conclusion, then does it not follow that the Senator himself and myself were wrong in opposing the munitions and war-cabinet bills?

Mr. KIRBY. Not at all. I might agree that some of the provisions of the bill were right and I might have supported it under different conditions. The people at the top in the management of the war said, "We can do it better this way without interference," and I thought we should let them do it that way, where they were in charge, and thought it could be done. They have come to this other idea. They have said that this is the best way to do it, and why? Not because they dislike that, but because the machine so recently developed has not worked as completely as they thought it might do. There are certain agencies in these departments that work by their right being prescribed by law, and if this man has the authority and if he has the need for the particular stuff that ought to be bought and the money to buy it with, he might not listen to somebody else who says the railroads ought to have the steel, that the Shipping Board ought to have the steel, that the War Department or the Navy Department ought to have the steel. That is where the trouble comes now. They have tried to adjust it. It takes too much conference, too much agreement, too much adjustment, and wastes too much time to get down to final action and results.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question again?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand he is of the opinion that the passage of this bill will not give the President the authority to interfere with the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. There are other Senators here who are without any question honest and able, who have given a great deal of study to the subject, who think that it would give the President that power. As far as I am concerned, I would not like to see those powers interfered with, and I would like to give to the President every power that could possibly be given him to aid him in carrying on the war. If the Senator feels that way, does he not think that as long as there is a substantial doubt among Senators who believe that we are giving him that power the remedy would be to amend the bill by taking the particular boards I have mentioned out of the bill?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not think so, and for this reason: This is a war measure which was intended to remedy a condition that needed remedying. Nobody now is authorized to decide what particular one of these agencies which have need of the steel on hand should have it. They all have the authority to buy and the money to pay for it, and nobody now, except a voluntary priority board, has authority to say who shall have the steel—whether the railroads, the Navy, the Army, or the Shipping Board. This agency the President might appoint would be supreme over them all for that particular purpose, so as to give the steel to the Navy, if it needs it most, and to send it out now.

Mr. NORRIS. The President would still have that power, with the exceptions I have noted.

Mr. KIRBY. Just a minute.

Mr. NORRIS. He should distribute the steel without any trouble.

Mr. KIRBY. When we get down to the question of the Interstate Commerce Commission is there anything wrong with the Interstate Commerce Commission? Has anybody complained about its action recently, about its having done anything unjustly or with having usurped any power? No. Has any complaint been made about the other commission? No. Have we not given power to strengthen the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Trade Corporation to finance the world, as it were, at least the United States, while the war is going on? There is nothing wrong with these agencies. There is no remedy expected to be applied to them. Do you think the President has time to go around to disorganize and derange and to destroy your agencies that have done nothing but good and against which there is no complaint in order that he might remedy a particular condition?

This is a bill it seems to me that ought to be passed, and I have given you the reasons. It is an elastic authority; it is a direct authority; it is a complete authority, supreme over all these agencies. It will eliminate competition and will eliminate diversity of action. It will save the Government money, it will save the Government time, and it will apply the resources to the war conditions where they are needed at the time when they are needed, and it will accelerate our preparation for war. It will make us stronger when we come to deliver the blow which will render the world free from this menace across the sea, and I believe the bill ought to be passed and without any further delay. We have had it under discussion for two months and a half. That is all I care to say.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I have no desire and do not intend to make an argument upon this measure beyond stating some of the reasons why I am constrained to oppose it in its present form.

I hear nothing from my constituency in the way of a demand that I shall assist in striking a blow that will scuttle the constitutional construction of our Government as created within the boundaries of the Commonwealth that I have the honor to represent, in part, or that would violate the traditions of that great State within whose borders rest those famous shrines of liberty—Valley Forge, where the contest of endurance was fought out, and Gettysburg, where the contest of arms was fought out.

Before stating my reasons for opposing the bill I wish to say that I do not desire to get into a controversy about any disputed questions of law in relation to this matter. I merely wish to put into the RECORD the reasons why I oppose the bill in its present form. Speaking broadly and divesting the bill of its verbiage, it provides, in my judgment, for two things. The first I shall put in the language of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who addressed the Senate yesterday afternoon, in which he stated that the sole object of the bill is to harmonize executive action and unify executive purpose. I do not agree that that is the sole object of the bill, but I accept it as defining the purpose of the first section of the bill. I think it is fair to say that the first section of the bill contemplates the harmonizing of executive action and the unification of executive purpose; and, Mr. President, so far as that portion of the bill is concerned, I entirely agree that it may be passed without injury to the country, although, as I have said before, I see no necessity for its passage for that purpose.

The distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] yesterday did me the honor to quote what I said upon that subject upon a former occasion, and whatever doubt I might have entertained as to the soundness of my views, those views are confirmed by the high authority of his approval. The Senator said:

> I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] in the remarks he made the other day, namely, that nearly all the powers that this bill proposes to vest in the President he already has. Let me quote from the RECORD what the Senator from Pennsylvania said:
> "Mr. KNOX. I think the President of the United States has the authority to require every executive officer and every department of the Government to do anything that he directs to be done in order to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion. I think he has the power to delegate from one Cabinet officer to another the discharge of any particular duty that he thinks such a Cabinet officer can discharge better than the one upon whom it would normally be incumbent. I do certainly think that the President has all those powers."
> Again, I quote from him:
> "Mr. KNOX. I have the very highest respect for those advising the President of the United States; but if that responsibility were cast upon me, as I have read the Overman bill, in so far as it proposes to authorize the President to utilize and coordinate executive activities, so far as I can see what it means from its language and so far as I am informed in this particular by those who are back of the bill, I would not hesitate a second to advise the President of the United States that he now fully possesses that power."

Or, in other words, to revert again to the language used by the Senator from Mississippi yesterday, I think that, to the extent the bill is intended to harmonize executive action and to unify executive purpose, it is at least harmless.

Mr. President, there is one other suggestion that I desire to make in connection with bringing about a new condition or a new scheme of coordination in the executive departments. There are two arguments made for the necessity of this bill. The one is the necessity for coordination; and the second argument is the necessity of doing away with duplication of work. I desire to read to the Senate what the President of the United States has said about new schemes that are proposed for coordination, and then I propose to read next what the Congress of the United States has said and has done in regard to obviating excessive duplication of work in the executive departments.

You will all recall, Mr. President, that in January, 1918, a letter was read to the Senate, which was addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], dated the 11th day of January, 1918, and signed by the President of the United States. The President in that letter said:

> THE WHITE HOUSE,
> Washington, January 11, 1918.
> That, of course, set my mind to work on that particular suggestion, and I feel that I ought to say to you, now that the matter is clear in my mind, that I hope sincerely no such recoordination will be attempted. For one thing, it would naturally include the Navy as well as the Army and would, so far as the Navy is concerned, bring about, I fear, a dislocation of activities which would cause delay where there is none that is avoidable; and in regard to the Army, I think that nothing substantial would be accomplished. Indeed, I believe that delay would inevitably be produced by such a measure.

Now, here come the golden words—

> I have had in the last few months a great deal of experience in trying to coordinate things, and upon every fresh coordination delay inevitably results, and not only delay, but all sorts of cross currents of demoralization which are very serious impediments to the effective conduct of business.

And yet we are besought to force upon the President or to put upon the President without any word of authority from him that he desires the power—a new, complicated, untried, undefined, and undefinable scheme of coordination unguided by the light of his experience.

Mr. President, a few days later we had still further information from the White House in regard to schemes that had sprung from the brain of senatorial wisdom, seeking to advise the President how he might coordinate and carry on his activities as the Chief Executive of the United States; and this time it was in a letter to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], which reads as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 23, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You have been kind enough to tell me that you had heard that I had written a letter to the chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee concerning the idea of a munitions minister, and you asked me whether I did write such a letter. I did, and am glad to send you herewith a copy of it.

The consultation referred to with Senator CHAMBERLAIN, to whom the letter is addressed, was upon the subject of the various difficulties and delays that had been encountered by the War Department, as shown by the testimony before the Senate committee, and the Senator merely mentioned to me that he had a bill in mind to create a munitions ministry. He gave me no detail of the bill he had in mind, and it was only when I learned afterwards from others of the real character of the proposals that I felt it my duty to write to the Senator and apprise him of my attitude. I assumed from what I heard later that that particular proposal had been abandoned, and I was referring in my statement of the other day to the very surprising proposal to create a superior war cabinet of a type unknown to our practice or institutions.

A just protest from his point of view against the violation of the practices and traditions of our institutions in creating a superior Cabinet for a specific purpose, whose powers, jurisdiction, and scope could no more compare with the super-President who would be created by this bill than the twinkling of the tiniest star with the shining brightness of the sun.

Mr. President, there is no man in this Chamber who is not willing to do all he can do, more perhaps than he ought to do, to uphold the hands of the President in this war; but the time has not come, the foe is not yet at our door, for the sake of whose repulsion we should be required to turn our backs upon the spirit of our institutions and to wreck the machinery of our Government that has been over a hundred years in construction.

Mr. President, I had difficulty in reaching a conclusion about this measure; but at last a thought came to my mind which clarified my duty, which made it perfectly easy for me to answer the question: "Shall I vote yea or nay upon this measure?" and I ask each Senator to put this question to himself: Should you vote for this bill unless you would be willing to vote specifically for anything that is possible under the bill? For instance, if you believe that under the provisions of this bill the powers of the Federal Reserve Board could be transferred to a minor official of the United States Government, or the Federal reserve banks could be merged in any insignificant national bank of the country, and that bill stood alone, would you vote for that bill? If you would not, you should not vote for a bill that includes that power. If a bill was proposed to transfer the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission to an inferior officer of the Government, would you vote for that bill if it stood alone? If you would not, you should not vote for this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KNOX. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I take it, from what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said, that he would not vote for such a bill as he has described.

Mr. KNOX. I certainly would not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania assume to himself more honesty, more statesmanship, and a higher sense of duty than are possessed by the great Executive head of this Government?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I am glad to answer that question. I challenge the Senator from North Carolina to recall from his memory or to search to-morrow morning the RECORD of what I have said this afternoon, or to go over anything that I have said heretofore on the floor of the Senate since the declaration of war, from which he can draw any conclusion that I have assumed anything upon my own part. I am stating, sir, what I started out to state; I am giving the reasons why I am going to vote against this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the question I want to put to the Senator. He says he would not vote for such a bill as that which he has described, nor would any other Senator vote for such a bill. Then the Senator is bound, under the same reasoning, to say that under this bill the President of the United States, acting for the people of this country, with statesmanship and ability and honesty, would not transfer the authority in the manner which the Senator has suggested. Is not that a just conclusion from what the Senator says?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I am arguing that we ought not to vote for a bill that gives the President such authority unless we would vote specifically for a measure that gave him that authority, and nothing else.

Mr. OVERMAN. And I intend to vote for this measure on the assumption that the President would exercise the powers conferred with the same honesty and the same ability as would the Senator from Pennsylvania, and, therefore, would not attempt to interfere with the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. KNOX. I think the question of the President's patriotism, the question of the President's ability, the question of the President's honesty has been lugged into this matter by the ears. I am not discussing anything in relation to the President or his characteristics. I am willing to concede that the President is, of patriots, the most patriotic; of honest men, the most honest; of wise men, the most omniscient; but that has no reference whatever to the point that I am seeking—although I am afraid not very clearly—to make upon that particular proposition, and for the benefit of the Senator from North Carolina I will repeat it. I will not vote for this or any other measure which, in my judgment, contains authority to do anything that I would not directly vote to confer upon the President. That is the test which I have applied to myself. I ask no other Senator to apply it to himself unless he seeks to do what I think we all ought to do—our plain duty under all the circumstances.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. KNOX. We can only act each according to his own light.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KNOX. I decline to yield at present. We can only act each according to his own light. Mine, humble though it be, leads me in this direction. Distinguished Senators upon the other side or upon this side of the Chamber, acting from superior light, may reach different conclusions, but I am merely attempting to state my own. I shall be glad now to yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question. He says he would not vote for any measure which contained authority to the President to perform an act, which authority he would not vote for directly and specifically to give the President. The Senator, of course, understands that the President under the present law could appoint 10 citizens of German birth, who had been naturalized, as members of his Cabinet. The Senator would not wish to restrict the President's power of appointment of his Cabinet simply because he has the authority under the present law to appoint 10 naturalized German citizens, if he sees fit, as members of his Cabinet, would he?

Mr. KNOX. The President does not have any authority under any statute that I ever voted for or will vote for; he gets his authority under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. But he has that authority under the Constitution of the United States, and, under specific laws passed in pursuance thereof, to appoint any qualified citizen to his Cabinet; and the Senator would not want to limit that general authority, would he?

Mr KNOX. I must ask the Senator from Tennessee to permit me to go on, as I have only a few minutes more, and I wish to make one or two further observations.

Applying my test specifically to the provisions of the second section of the bill, I might cite, by way of illustration, half a dozen cases where I would not vote for a specific bill for the purpose of lodging certain powers in the President or in anybody else; but, as the Interstate Commerce Commission has been the case most usually cited, I will use that illustration as well. Senators know that the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes" is a power conferred upon the Congress of the United States, and upon it exclusively. The very first time that clause of the Constitution came to the Supreme Court for interpretation the court said: This power rests exclusively in the Congress; it is complete; it has no limitations. We all know that at the time the Constitution was written, and for many years thereafter, this power practically laid dormant; there was nothing upon which the power could operate; commerce between the States was meager and conducted, such as there was of it, in such a small and humble manner—such as by stage coach and wagon—that there was no occasion to invoke the Federal authority over such commerce.

By and by the canal, then the railroad, then the expansion of population beyond the Alleghenies, then beyond the Mississippi, and on to the Pacific coast, the closer relations between the States, the growing population of the country, the increased manufacturing activities springing up, and the opening of the Great Plains for agriculture, created a large and a vast commerce between the States and between the United States and foreign countries, which eventually demanded regulation at the hands of Congress in order to protect the public against the unjust practices of the railroads, the steamship companies, and other instrumentalities of transportation. Then it was, Mr. President, that the Congress, realizing it to be its duty to lay the regulatory hand upon transportation, conceived the idea of creating a great commission to carry out a great policy. That policy was the policy of Congress; it was a policy with which no other coordinate branch of the Government had anything to do in formulating or in putting into the form of law, except as the President, as a part of the legislative branch of the Government, signed the bill by which the Interstate Commerce Commission was created.

The policy established by that measure, stated in a sentence, was that the people of the United States were entitled to have the highways of commerce kept open to all upon equal and reasonable terms. In order that that policy should be carried out and that the small man with a small consignment of goods should stand upon the same footing as the man with trainloads of goods upon these highways of the Republic, the Congress created a commission to supervise the lines of transportation, to hear complaints where injustice was alleged, to pass upon the reasonableness of rates and the fairness of practices, the manner of the distribution of cars, and, generally, to see that all were treated alike upon the common highway.

That, Mr. President, is not an executive commission; it is an administrative commission, and if we were to undertake to transfer the execution of the policy of Congress to any official of the United States, no matter how distinguished or how capable or how patriotic he might be, we would be abdicating our function of supervision over the policy which we established and the commission which we created.

Now, as to the constitutionality of this bill, I do not propose to get into the web and the mazes of a technical discussion of constitutional law. It may be technically true, Mr. President, although I do not accept the proposition, that we may confirm a man for a high office and then immediately confer upon the President of the United States the power to transfer the performance of the functions and duties of that office to somebody else. But is it ethically sound? The Constitution of the United States provides in respect to all but minor offices that the officer shall be confirmed by the Senate. The President's power is a limited power. The President has the power to nominate to this body a man whom he believes to be qualified for an office, but the Constitution says that man shall not receive the appointment or obtain his commission unless he is confirmed by the Senate. Why? It is impossible for the President of the United States to be so well acquainted with the population of the country as to be able to make a solitary judgment upon the question of a man's capability. So the theory is that when a man's name is sent to the Senate the Senators from the particular State will know more about him than the President himself, and that the Senators from the other States will seek information from the Senators from the State from which the appointment has been made. In a particular case Smith, of Pennsylvania, is appointed to an office. You come to me and ask me what I know about Smith, if you are trying to do your duty, and you will perhaps be largely governed by the judgment which I express as to his character and his ability.

Now, Mr. President, can we be said loyally to adhere to the spirit, even if we are adhering to the letter of the Constitution, if we confirm a man to-day for a particular office because of his character, because of his ability, and because of his aptitude, and then pass a law that enables the President to transfer that official to some other duty or put some minor official in his place upon whose character, ability, and aptitude we have not passed? You are keeping the word of promise to the ear but breaking it to the hope in a transaction of that kind.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. KNOX. I have only a moment or two longer, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to ask the Senator a question, but if it would encroach too much upon his time I will not ask it.

Mr. KNOX. I will inquire how much time I have, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania began his speech at 3.57, but there was an interruption when a message from the House was received. The Senator has three minutes more.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I prefer to conclude my remarks, then, without interruption.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to say that another thought has occurred to me in connection with this bill. I think this whole proceeding is belittling the President. I think those who advised him that this measure was desirable or necessary have put him in a false position. They have put him in a position where he is reaching for crutches when he has wings, pinioned with power and with all the country's resources. He did not need such legislation as this when he appointed Mr. Baruch at the head of the War Industries Board; he did not rely upon such legislation as this when he called Mr. Schwab, the great captain of industry, to take charge of the shipbuilding of the United States; nor did he think it was necessary to have such legislation in the selection of Mr. Ryan to look after the Aircraft Board. Three appointments have in fact advanced the program of war. If this measure is intended to speed the war, if this measure is intended to bring the war to a successful and speedy conclusion, I ask you to compare the petty things that it contemplates being done with the great things the President himself has accomplished without recourse to any such authority.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am in rather thorough agreement with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] in the statement that Congress has been abrogating its powers. I, however, am inclined to believe that the limitation has run; that it is too late to raise that question.

I do not intend to discuss generally at this time my idea as to the duty of Congress with reference to the national defense; but I do believe that the Constitution of the United States did not intend to create a dictatorship when it named the President as the Commander in Chief of the Army. I disagree entirely with that theory of government. I think that when the Constitution vested in the Congress of the United States the power to defend the country in time of war, it meant something.

I have always believed that the commander in chief of an army must be responsible to some power. I do not believe that the Constitution contemplated that the Commander in Chief, Gen. Wilson, should be responsible only and solely to the Chief Executive, President Wilson. However, it is too late to discuss those questions.

At an early period in this war legislation I undertook, by introducing a bill here with reference to the armed-neutrality measure of the President, to differentiate as I saw the difference and as I see it now. To provide that the President might have authority to arm ships was one thing. To provide that the owners or the crews of those ships might have authority to fire on the national vessels of another country was another thing. The one is an executive power, properly to be exercised by the President by a simple order allowing the ships to sail from a port with certain guns upon them. The other is a legislative power vested, in my judgment, solely in the legislature by the Constitution of the United States. This difference has been very thoroughly impressed upon my mind, but it is too late to discuss it. The Congress of the United States had the authority—and, in my judgment, it was its duty—if it was necessary at all to create a board of food control to create that board itself, to provide for the appointment of officers, to retain jurisdiction over the acts of those officers, and to retain to itself the power to hold those officers responsible for the performance of those duties, which, in my judgment, it clearly could do. The Congress of the United States has vested all those powers in the President of the United States.

We are now confronted, as has been said more than once, by a condition. The President of the United States—as the President—not as the Commander in Chief of the Army—has more power vested in him by the Constitution of the United States than is vested by the Constitution of Germany or Prussia in the Kaiser to-day. The President of France is elected by the French Assembly. The Prime Minister of England is chosen by the Parliament. The Parliament is conducting the war from the English standpoint, and the corresponding French body is conducting it from the French standpoint. Under our theory of Government, as it has been expounded and as we are now pursuing it, should this bill, an administration measure, be defeated, it could have no result whatsoever, except a purely negative result. The theory which has been adopted by so many of our lawyers and apparently adopted by our legislature in the carrying on of war is that the power of Congress is purely a negative power; that it can only refuse to grant some authority or to vote money for the carrying on of the war. I do not believe that the constitutional provision that no appropriation for the Army should be made for longer than two years was the only legislative limitation intended by that instrument to be imposed upon the power of the Commander in Chief of the Army; but, as I say, it is entirely too late to discuss those propositions.

The bill before us now I do not construe as it is construed by the eminent Senator who just preceded me and by so many others who are objecting to its passage. I think this bill should be entitled "A bill to fix administrative responsibility." In my judgment that is the effect of it, and for that reason I shall support it. I agree with many of the Senators who have said that for all practical purposes the Chief Executive possesses the necessary powers which will be given him, or which are attempted to be given him, by this bill. The condition which confronts us is this: The American people are told from day to day that the President can not prosecute this war successfully because of limitations placed upon his power by the Congress of the United States, or, as they put it, because of the failure of the Congress of the United States to confer the proper authority upon him.

Why, Mr. President, if the army of camouflage artists who are in the service of the different departments of this Government, either through the press or otherwise, could be sent to the trenches in France, they could relieve every Frenchman who is engaged in attempting to screen the heavy artillery or the boys in the trenches with their rifles. I maintain that the President has the necessary power already. I want to fix upon him the absolute responsibility for his acts. I want the people of the United States to understand that if there is a disgraceful controversy between John Skelton Williams, representing the transportation interests of this Government, upon the one hand, and Garfield, representing or misrepresenting the coal production, on the other, it is a family row in in the White House; that it is the President quarreling with the President; that it is not the fault of Congress; that there is no lack of authority vested in the President to consolidate John Skelton Williams and Garfield, if he chooses to do so, now. But it is given out every day that because of the failure of Congress to act the President is hampered in performing his duty as Chief Executive and the Commander in Chief. In my judgment there is not one word of truth in this charge; but Congress stands responsible, through the efforts of these camouflage artists, to the people of the United States, rather than the President of the United States, who is responsible.

Mr. Hoover is no creation of Congress. Mr. Hoover is Woodrow Wilson. The authority which he exercises is vested in the President of the United States by the terms of the act, not in Mr. Hoover. The authority which is exercised by Mr. Garfield is vested in the President of the United States, not in Mr. Garfield. The President of the United States was responsible, and is yet responsible, for clogging the wheels of business of this country under the Garfield order. The President of the United States and not Garfield is responsible for refusal to even listen to the respectful request voiced by this body in its resolution asking that the operation of that order be deferred. Let the responsibility fall where it should—upon the President of the United States—and by the terms of this bill, when enacted into law, the man on the farm, the man in the factory, the man in the office, the men here in the Senate, the people in the galleries, can understand that no longer can these hired writers supporting the administration charge the Congress with a responsibility which does not rest upon them. Then the people, looking to the White House, the true throne of all administrative power—as the President himself has expressed it in some of his writings—can understand clearly, with the underbrush cut away, that the President is responsible for the conduct of this war, and he alone. If he is successful in its administration, as I said a few days ago, let his be the success. Congress will not perform its constitutional duties, in my judgment. It has so far refused to do so. As was said by the eloquent Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], it has "passed the buck." Having vested the authority in every instance in the Chief Executive, let it be understood by the people of the United States that his, and his alone, is the responsibility, and let us hear no more criticism, in so far as Congress is concerned, of our failure or refusal to act.

The condition with which we are confronted is a state of mind. It is a temperament. The President of the United States, in my judgment, is a man of very peculiar temperament. It has been a very interesting study for me to devote a few minutes from time to time to an attempt to arrive at the method by which he reaches various conclusions upon various subjects. In my studies along this line I have delved into the writings of the eminent author, Dr. Wilson, from time to time and have been very much impressed with passages from his various books and speeches. One of those which I have in mind now I have before me in the shape of an extract from Congressional Government, by Dr. Wilson, which was published in 1885, during the administration of Grover Cleveland. I think nothing could be more instructive than for us to contemplate for a moment the Presidency as Dr. Wilson understands it and his ideal President.

I read from pages 41 and 42 of Congressional Government. Dr. Wilson said:

> The President * * * was constituted one of the three great coordinate branches of the Government; his functions were made of the highest dignity; his privileges many and substantial—so great, indeed, that it has pleased the fancy of some writers to parade them as exceeding those of the British Crown; and there can be little doubt that, had the presidential chair always been filled by men of commanding character, of acknowledged ability, and of thorough political training, it would have continued to be a seat of the highest authority and consideration, the true center of the Federal structure, the real throne of administration, and the frequent source of policies. Washington and his Cabinet commanded the ear of Congress, and gave shape to its deliberations; Adams, though often crossed and thwarted, gave character to the Government; and Jefferson, as President no less than as Secretary of State, was the real leader of his party. But the prestige of the presidential office has declined with the character of the Presidents.

Mr. President, there is no doubt in the world that in the minds of many, possibly of a majority, of the good citizens of this United States, the Government of the United States is now in the hands of the ideal President. There is no doubt in my mind now that the President himself has achieved the ideals in the mind of Dr. Wilson; that the present Executive, in the judgment of the present Excutive, combines all the great qualities of Washington and of Adams as a President, and all the great qualities of Thomas Jefferson as the leader of his party. As a matter of fact, it has been rather impressed upon me that the latter is considered by the President at times the greatest achievement of all, because he is constantly telling us that he is the leader of his party. Unfortunately for us, not only are the vast powers, the enormous powers, practically all the powers, vested in the President of the United States to conduct this war but we have combined with that the difficulty of laboring under the form of a party government, and not at this time alone the form of a party government, but the form of a partisan government. You will all admit, the Senators upon the other side will admit, that these are facts which I am stating to-day. There is no question about the fact that a great committee, controlled by the majority Senators upon the other side, can not allow the selection as chairman of that committee of the man most eminently qualified of all others possibly of this body or in either body of Congress, purely because of partisan politics.

Unfortunately, we are confronted with that state of affairs—the fact that this is a party government. I am not criticising the Democrats more than I would criticize the Republicans if they were in power. Very likely, under our party form of government, if there were a Republican majority in this body it would be just as partisan, and would refuse to surrender any part of its committee control or patronage, just as the refusal would come from the other side.

It is unfortunate for us in time of war that we have a partisan Government. It is unfortunate, I may say, in my judgment, that we have at this time in the White House a President whose conception of the enormous burden resting upon him as a party leader is so vivid at all times in his mind. Those matters are unfortunate, but the difficulties are the fault of our form of Government and not of the present generation. We must meet them, therefore. We must understand that the President of the United States wants all power. We must understand that under our party system of government he is going to get it. I am going to assist in giving him every particle of power which he asks for as necessary to carry on this war, because in my judgment the Congress will not assume the power, and it is necessary for some one to have it.

As I said in the beginning, I say now, as we are drawing to the conclusion of this war legislation let us give the President no opportunity or reason to say that the Congress has not absolute confidence in his ability and his patriotism or that it will hesitate at any moment to give him all the power that he demands.

I have confidence in the President's patriotism. I know that he is a man of very great ability. I have no confidence whatsoever in his judgment of men. He looks to himself as the ultimate source of all power, and I want to drive home to him the understanding that his is the ultimate responsibility for the exercise of that power. This is the reason that will dictate my vote upon this bill.

In so far as the amendments offered concerning the Federal Reserve Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission are concerned, Mr. President, I am not at all impressed with the arguments which have been made in favor of excluding from the operation of this bill the power to interfere with the duties of these two boards, except as those arguments have been advanced by sincere Senators, able Senators, in whose judgment I have very great confidence. As a personal matter, because of their very great interest and feeling in the matter, which I know is only dictated by their sincere convictions, I am rather inclined to vote for the amendments excluding the Federal Reserve Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission from the operation of this bill. Under the general theory upon which I am proceeding in voting for the bill, I regret that these Senators have proposed such amendments. I regret that they have placed me in a position where, not considering the matter of any importance upon the one hand or the other, I am rather inclined to vote as they think is best in this particular matter. I would very much prefer that there should be no exception whatsoever. However, I can not see where in the future any friend of the President can claim that by excluding from the operation of this bill the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the one hand and the Federal Reserve Board upon the other we have restricted the President in any way so that he can not perform his duties as Commander in Chief of the Army. Should he raise that question, should he say to the Congress, or should one of his servile followers say, that by such exclusion we have in any way whatsoever tied his hands so that he can not properly carry on this war, I will unhesitatingly vote at any time to place those two departments of the Government within the provisions of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The bill is in Committee of the Whole and subject to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, there are Senators here who I know have amendments that they desire to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendments are in order. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after section 2, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the President is further authorized to establish an executive agency which may exercise such jurisdiction and control over the production of airplanes, airplane engines, and aircraft equipment as in his judgment may be advantageous, and further to transfer to such agency, for its use, all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of airplanes, airplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the object of the amendment which I have offered must be apparent to every Senator who has heard it read.

May I say, in brief explanation—if any explanation is needed—that the so-called Overman bill by implication, at least, forbids the creation of any new agency by the President or any new bureau by any department chief, as I read the bill. The Senate will remember that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, after a most exhaustive investigation of the aircraft situation, made a report stating the exact facts as of April 1, 1918, and among its recommendations urged that the production of aircraft, airplane engines, and aircraft equipment be placed under a single executive head, responsible to the President. In making this recommendation it followed the example of the administrations of more than one foreign government engaged in this war, and engaged likewise in the production of great air fleets. It also followed consistently the opinion of the committee, as voiced early in this year, in reporting the so-called director of munitions bill, which, much as this amendment would provide, authorized the President to create a directorship of munitions, and to transfer to that officer the production and manufacture of such munitions of war as the President deemed wise.

The Senate will remember that this morning there was published in the public press an announcement that Mr. John D. Ryan had been placed in charge of the production of aircraft and aircraft material; but upon an examination of that announcement it will be found that Mr. John D. Ryan, while placed at the head of a division of the War Department whose business it will be to supervise the production of aircraft and aircraft material, is, by virtue of his position as a chief of division, subordinate to the Assistant Secretaries of War and to the Secretary of War himself; and that the great problem of the production of aircraft and airplane engines, even under the admirable step in advance that was taken by the President and reflected in the order issued to-day, is still subordinate to the Secretary of War, and still subordinate to his assistants, as I read the order; and Mr. Ryan's position will not be that of a strong, independent, single-headed executive.

Furthermore, as I look upon it, unless some such amendment as I have proposed is adopted, either in a separate bill or as an amendment to the Overman bill—and I thought this was an opportune time to propose this legislation—unless some such amendment is adopted, as I understand the statutes, Mr. Ryan, as Chief of the Division of Aircraft Production, will not be clothed with the power of making contracts and spending money, for he does not occupy an office authorized by an act of Congress to expend money, and for whose support appropriations have been made.

I am not entirely certain that my colleagues upon the Senate Committee on Military Affairs agree with me in every respect in my opinion of the proper method of organizing and putting through this aircraft program; but suffice it to say, Senators, that I am convinced that unless we put this program in the hands of the ablest man we can find in the United States—and it may very well be that no better man can be found than Mr. Ryan—and at the same time give him all the scope and power necessary to make the decisions himself, without reference to any one else—except, of course, the President of the United States—we will jeopardize the prompt progress of this work.

The amendment that I have offered adds to the Overman bill this additional power to be placed in the hands of the President, not the Secretary of War, by which he can create a separate and distinct executive agency, if he sees fit—I leave it to him—and clothe that agency with all the control and jurisdiction over the manufacture and production of an air fleet that he thinks that agency should possess, and at the same time authorizes him to transfer to that agency any or all appropriations heretofore made for the manufacture of airplanes, airplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

Mr. President, I feel very deeply upon this question. Of course, I have not the time nor the inclination, at this hour of the day, nor under the limitations placed upon me by the unanimous-consent agreement, to go into a long discussion of the progress thus far made in our aircraft program. It is not a pleasant or a pretty story to tell. I have every confidence that Mr. Ryan can do infinitely better than the organization which he is succeeding; but I should have the more confidence in his ability to carry this thing to a successful conclusion at a comparative early date were I sure that he was not hampered by any superior authority in all our Government, except the President of the United States alone.

Mr. OVERMAN. I feel that there are very strong reasons for such legislation, and I think the Overman bill is carrying out just what the Senator from New York wants to accomplish. Before passing on this amendment I want to examine the acts establishing the Aircraft Board. I think there were two acts passed. I ask the Senator from New York if there were not two acts passed regarding the Aircraft Board.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no legislation pending upon the aircraft problem, so far as I know.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am talking about the act which we passed appropriating $640,000,000 for the Aircraft Board.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me assure the Senator from North Carolina that this amendment in no way can affect the functions of the Aircraft Board. The Aircraft Board has no functions except to sit at a table and debate, and that has been the great trouble.

Mr. OVERMAN. That has been the trouble, not only there but elsewhere.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And the Overman bill as written does not cure it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it does. The President is authorized to transfer functions and powers already granted by Congress. He appointed Mr. Ryan, who, as the Senator says, is a very capable man. I admit that there is a great deal of confusion there. There is an Aircraft Board, and certain officers appointed and certain duties imposed upon them and certain money appropriated for the purpose. This bill does not authorize the President to use any funds appropriated by Congress except for the purpose for which the money was appropriated. In the act we passed $640,000,000 was appropriated. We created a board with certain functions. Mr. Ryan is at the head of it. Why can not the Overman bill transfer to Mr. Ryan the functions created by the act establishing the board and establishing the officers who have fallen down and put into Mr. Ryan's hands the money and tell him to go on and do the work?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My answer to the Senator from North Carolina is that functions such as he has described can not be transferred to Mr. Ryan because they do not exist.

Mr. OVERMAN. I say I want to examine the acts. I know we passed an act here of about eight pages establishing the board and providing for certain officers and appropriating a certain sum of money. That is what I want to see, whether under this bill those functions could be transferred to some one who will carry out the will of Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The trouble is that Mr. Ryan does not exist as a governmental agency, as I view it under the terms of this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think he is an administrative agent. That is what I want to accomplish.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My object is to give him real power. I am somewhat weary of these pretended improvements in the administration of this war machinery.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I want to give him—real power.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I want something real created. That is why I wanted a director of munitions, because he would be a real agent.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is why I am advocating the Overman bill; it is because I want to see something real.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Overman bill says nothing, and thus far has meant nothing, because no one knows what can or will be done under it. This is some definite thing directed at the most difficult problem that now confronts our war-making machine.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have tried to carry out the views of the President.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment go over until to-morrow?

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator desires.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall not insist on a vote this afternoon if the Senator wants to look into the question.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said I would like to examine the law. There are two acts which have already been passed on the subject of airplanes, and there is confusion in the two acts themselves, as the Senator knows. I want to examine the acts and see whether under this bill we can do the thing we want to do. I think we can, but I am not sure about it. I started out by saying that I wanted to examine those two acts, because I want to do not only with regard to the Aircraft Board but other boards just what the Senator wants to do in regard to the Aircraft Board.

Mr. KIRBY. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will accept the amendment. I believe it only makes clear the purpose of the bill and is not inconsistent with it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not opposing the amendment.

Mr. KIRBY. I say I hope the Senator will accept it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has referred to two aircraft laws enacted at the last session. It may be that there are two; indeed, I think there are; but I do not believe that they are contradictory to each other. I have here public act No. 48 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, which is entitled "An act to create the Aircraft Board and provide for its maintenance."

Section 2 determines that the number shall not be more than nine in all, and of whom the nine shall consist.

Section 3 fixes the tenure of office of the members.

Section 4 is the important one. Therefore I will read it:

That the board is hereby empowered, under the direction and control of and as authorized by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, on behalf of the Departments of War and Navy, to supervise and direct, in accordance with the requirements prescribed or approved by the respective departments, the purchase, production, and manufacture of aircraft, engines, and all ordnance and instruments used in connection therewith, and accessories and materials therefor, including the purchase, lease, acquisition, or construction of plants for the manufacture of aircraft, engines, and accessories: Provided, That the board may make recommendations as to contracts and their distribution in connection with the foregoing, but every contract shall be made by the already constituted authorities of the respective departments.

It would seem, Mr. President, from the recitals of section 4 that the contention of the Senator from New York is sound, and unless his amendment or something which will be its equivalent is adopted either as a part of this bill or as an independent law, the new director of the Aircraft Board or of aircraft production may find himself entirely without power to make his work effective.

I quite agree with the Senator from New York that the time has come—indeed, we have been painfully conscious of it for some time—when efficiency and activity shall characterize the work of the Aircraft Board. We want battle planes. The need for them is crying. The need for them has existed for a long time. The President has appointed the right man for the right place. Let us place this amendment in the bill and give him the power which he must possess over every branch of production to the end that we may as soon as possible supply the Army across the sea with its needed equipment of fighting planes of every description. I regard this as one of the most important amendments that has been or will be offered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree that something like this ought to be done, but there is another act to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator. The first act is dated July 24, 1917. Then Congress passed another act.

Mr. THOMAS. This is the later act.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; Congress is always legislating and doing nothing. That is what I am talking about. We pass an act here and do not accomplish what we want to accomplish. I want to do what the Senator from New York wants to do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator remembers, of course, that the act from which the Senator from Colorado has just read was drafted by the Administration and sent to the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has been a failure, and I want to improve it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The act which was passed July 24, 1917, the first act establishing the Aircraft Board, contains five or six pages, and I want to examine it. I am in sympathy with the view of the Senator from New York as to what ought to be done. I think there is merit in his amendment. I am opposed to creating any new agency in this bill, and I struck it out because I doubted whether we ought to give the President the power to create any new agency and to transfer these functions to some agency which Congress had not created. Congress has passed two acts, and still we have confusion. We are passing acts every day. Here I have on my desk a bill that has been in Congress for months, asked by the War Department, to transfer from the Quartermaster Department, because the President has no discretion under the limitations of the law, to the Provost Marshal's Office certain engineers to aid in construction work. It was here in the Senate on the calendar I do not know how long and could not be gotten up. It finally passed the Senate without any objection, and is now resting in the House of Representatives. It is no wonder that we have delays when we have to pass acts every time the President wants to do anything. We do not question it; it is passed here without objection, and when we pass an act we have to pass another act and then another act. How can we fight the war in that way?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator inform the Senate how we can fight the war if the Senate is going to adjourn at 1.30 to-morrow?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not my fault. I have tried to get this bill through, but, as we know, to-morrow is a holiday.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It should not be a holiday for the Senate of the United States. If the matter is as pressing as the Senator from North Carolina states we ought to stay here and work.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with the Senator fully but the Senate has agreed to adjourn, and I can not help that. It is a great holiday. The President issued a proclamation, and every city in the United States will observe it as a holiday, and the people are to assemble everywhere. Of course I could make no objection to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have been surprised at the statement of the Senator from North Carolina in his condemnation of the bills which have been rushed through the Senate. I wanted to ask the Senator if there has been a single administration or war bill brought up here that has not been backed by the administration and prepared outside the halls of Congress, and has not the objection to their consideration on the floor always been that they were not properly prepared, and that they did not reperesent clearly the ideas which their advocates claimed they represented?

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with the Senator. I want to give the President power instead of having him come to Congress and ask for every little bill required to be passed to consolidate and transfer the functions. I want to give him the power so that there may be some harmony and that business principles may be followed in conducting the war.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand the Senator now to advocate the proposition that all the emergency bills which have been presented to us, claimed as necessary for carrying on the war, are now mistakes and that we should sweep them all out of existence?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And give the power to the President to do as he wishes?

Mr. OVERMAN. Surely not, Mr. President. I would not think of such a thing; but I said we had to pass the bills. I do not know who drafted the bills. I voted for them because I thought they were necessary. Now, after the power has been given by Congress, and this Overman bill only refers to powers that have been given by Congress it allows the President to transfer the functions.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly; I will be glad to answer it.

Mr. NORRIS. In reference to the act the Senator refers to, the one approved in July, I think, does not the Senator remember very distinctly that the day that bill was reported to the Senate we had unanimous consent to consider the unfinished business, and we were operating under a unanimous-consent agreement, and that at 2 o'clock we had to take up the unfinished business under that agreement?

I do not remember the bill we had up, but it was some bill we had to dispose of, and in the meantime if anything could be disposed of it had to be done during the morning hour. The act to which the Senator refers and which he says was the first bill, and it was the longest bill, that outlined an aircraft program was reported to the Senate and called up during the morning hour. A demand was made that it should be passed by the Senate during the morning hour, and a Senator on the other side made an objection or debated it and took up the time, and it was not passed that day. The next day during the morning hour the bill was passed; and that was the only consideration the Senate gave to it.

Does the Senator remember that the first day when it came in the morning papers of New York in an Associated Press dispatch said, and it was published all over the United States, telling the Senate and the country that on that day this aircraft bill was coming up and that two Senators or three, I think, whom it mentioned by name, were expected to object to it; that the New York World, I think it was, had a long editorial on the very day that it was brought in, published in the morning before the bill was taken up here at 12, denouncing in very severe terms the men who it was said were going to object to its consideration that day; and that one Senator was denounced all over the United States through an Associated Press dispatch because he was going to object to that bill? When it came up the Senator mentioned never said a word. He did not object, and later upon the floor he stated as a question of privilege that he had never read the bill; that he did not know it was coming up that day, and that he had no objection whatever to it.

Those are the circumstances under which that bill passed the Senate. I mention that because the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] very aptly said the other day if we would give a little better consideration to some of these bills we would not be under the necessity afterwards of passing other bills and amending them, and finding we had done poor work. But the very act the Senator mentioned was passed during the morning hour and it was passed, as I remember now, the next day after it was reported, when it had less than four hours for consideration, although it carried an appropriation of $640,000,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no doubt the Senator's recollection is right about it. Of course, I do not remember everything. I do not think I read that editorial, although I may have done so. I say we ought to have given more consideration to that bill, as we should consider all bills that come before us, but we need not delay them for a month.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me a little further, at the time I had a personal conversation with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] after I had read the dispatch, and he discovered later that it was an Associated Press dispatch in which the announcement was made. It went all over his State, and he received letters of condemnation from all over the United States. He said on the floor of the Senate that he had never talked to a soul on earth in regard to the bill; that he did not have any idea the bill was coming up, and had never read it.

Mr OVERMAN. I agree with all the Senator has said. As I said, we have passed so many bills without full consideration that we need this Overman bill.

Mr. NORRIS. We were pushed along by the press of the country——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must insist that Senators shall address the Chair, because every minute that is occupied by interruptions is charged against the Senator who has the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to say that if the Overman bill does not do what the amendment proposes, I am inclined to accept the amendment. I want to do just what it proposes. I will look over the two acts to-night, and if I find this bill does not carry out what the Senator from New York proposes I shall be inclined to accept his amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very glad to hear the Senator say so. As a matter of course he should be given the privilege of examining the two laws before the amendment is pressed. I merely wish to call attention to the fact that the law which I read was approved the 1st of October last, and it is therefore the latest expression of the lawmaking power on the subject. It is a general principle of construction that if there be a conflict between statutes the last expression of the legislature shall prevail. I do not assume that there is any contradiction between the first and the second of these acts; but it is the law upon the subject; and therefore the amendment offered by the Senator from New York is imperatively necessary in my judgment. I am satisfied that even if the construction of his bill by the Senator from North Carolina should convince him that it is already sufficiently broad to provide for the conditions outlined in the amendment of the Senator from New York, we should nevertheless adopt the amendment, because in that case it certainly can do no harm.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator from North Carolina to ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York should go over until to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was understood that the amendment would go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending amendment.

RECESS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., Thursday, April 25, 1918) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, April 26, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 25, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, for the spirit of heroism resident in the soul of man, which, in the supreme moment, lifts him out of himself and makes him divine; that it is not confined to any class or people, but is universal, suggesting the common origin of man in the one God and Father of us all; manifesting itself in the quiet walks of life, as in times of distress; in peace, as in war; in every home, hamlet, town, city, nation, round the world.

It is the charm of literature, art, and religious achievements and gilds the pages of history, sacred and profane, rears monuments in every nation to its heroes.

In this hour of peril heroes are in the making, not only at the front, amid the roar of shot and shell, but in the home; fathers, mothers, wives, children are asking, not will he come back, but has he gone to serve his country and humanity; a heroism sublime and worthy of all commendation, in attestation of the world's great Exemplar, in His heroic sacrifice. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. TILSON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by me before the Aeronautical Engineers of America in New York City a short time ago on the subject of our aviation program.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address that he made in New York City on the subject of aeronautics. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 9832) to authorize the incorporated town of Seward, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $25,000 for the purpose of constructing dikes, flumes, and other works to confine the waters of Lowell Creek for the protection of said town.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. I rise to a question of privilege affecting the dignity and proceedings of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 24 appears a speech delivered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] entitled "Mr. HEFLIN's reply to Hon. WILLIAM E. MASON, of Illinois." This speech, with one or two minor corrections, I think, in punctuation or abbreviation and transposition of words, and possibly one or two words omitted, is an exact duplicate of the speech made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] on April 23. The gentleman from Alabama did not ask nor was he granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the question of personal privilege to which he rose. And my point is that no Member has the right, after having made a speech upon the floor of the House which is duly inserted and printed in the RECORD, to have that speech again printed in the back of the RECORD upon the following or any other day, without consent being given. Of course, I can understand how the gentleman from Alabama, considering that his motives had been impugned, should desire the greatest publicity to the statements which he made. It may be that he intended to have these remarks inserted in some other publication, the Reclamation Record, or some other document that is printed by the Government, but certainly no permission was given the gentleman to extend his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to reprint the exact proceedings of April 23 in the RECORD of April 24 when those proceedings had been once printed.

Now, I submit that, with the great shortage of paper with which the Printing Office is confronted, it is hardly becoming the dignity of the House to permit such a matter as this to go by without notice. If there were errors in the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama, or if there were errors in the proceedings of the House upon the date when he rose to his question of personal privilege, they could easily have been corrected by him upon request. But certainly there is nothing in the rules of the House that permit this wholesale extension and repetition of proceedings that have once been printed. Therefore, in order to bring the matter properly before the House——

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to be heard, Mr. Speaker, on that.

Mr. WALSH (continuing). I move that the record of the proceedings [Mr. HEFLIN'S speech] appearing in the RECORD for April 24 be expunged from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], appearing in the RECORD of April 24, be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard on the subject.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. I rise to be heard on the motion.

Mr. WALSH. I have not yielded the floor. I will yield to the gentleman if he desires to be heard.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know, Mr. Speaker. Will I have right in my own time to speak?

The SPEAKER. The practice and the rule is that the gentleman from Massachusetts has an hour, and at the end of the time, if he wants to move the previous question, or at any time during that period, he has the right to do it. If at the end of the hour he does not move the previous question, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama or any other gentleman who wants to be recognized.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope the gentleman will not move the previous question. I would like to be heard. I do not want very much time.

Mr. WALSH. I think it only fair that I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HEFLIN. Fifteen minutes?

Mr. WALSH. I think he ought to make explanation in less time than that.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not know. Give me 10 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I gave my speech day before yesterday to the messenger, Mr. Robinson, who comes around from time to time to get the manuscript of gentlemen who address the House. I said to him, "I do not want them to make any mistakes in this." He said they would not, but they did. Now, I do not know whether anybody had anything to do with causing the mistake or not. I do not suppose they did, but that RECORD made me say that I was proceeding under the rule "for political purposes" [laughter], and I disclaimed any such intention from the very start of my speech, and I said that what I was doing was my patriotic duty as I saw it.

I recall, Mr. Speaker, on a former occasion that I had 25,000 copies of a speech printed, and they made an error in that speech at the Printing Office, and Mr. Smith, the RECORD clerk, made them print the whole copy over again, because they had done me a wrong and had made a mistake in the print of that speech.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman was paying for that?

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not pay for the next copy.

Mr. MADDEN. I know; but if they had not printed according to instructions they would be compelled to print it over. But the gentleman paid the bill?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. But now the gentleman would permit somebody in the Printing Office to do me an injustice and have the speech containing that injustice go all over the country and put me in a wrong light and make me appear to be saying what I did not say.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has suggested that I could have gotten up here and have had the permanent RECORD corrected; but that is not sufficient. This RECORD will be the RECORD that will be read all over the country, and the permanent RECORD would not be read, maybe, for a year; and they have put me in a false position before the House and the country.

I want the gentleman to read what is in the RECORD of April 23, beginning with the words—

I have commended the course of men on both sides, but because I see fit to reply to a Member's speech that he makes upon the floor of this House.

Listen:

I hold, Mr. Speaker, and I believe the Speaker will hold, since the matter is laid before him, that I am proceeding in the line of privilege provided for for political purposes. No; gentlemen. Nothing is further than in the rules. I am not attacking the gentleman from Illinois that from my mind, although one paper in my State has played up his speech, published it in full, and attacking me—a strange thing.

Did you ever hear of such a mixed-up mess of stuff? [Laughter.]

Here is the way they made the mistake: They cut these pages apart; they have 25 men setting up the type at once. They take the scissors and cut the pages, and one man is setting up one part here and another man is setting up another part yonder. That is the way they cut it up. I submit to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I was entirely correct in my position.

I will tell you how I got it published again. I went out here and asked Mr. Smith, the RECORD clerk, how this happened. He called them up, and they said they would look into it. I said, "I want that speech printed again, or I will bring it to the attention of the House." He took it up with the Printing Office, and they said, "Tell Mr. HEFLIN it will be printed again." Then he asked me what heading to put on it, and I said, "Just say 'Mr. HEFLIN'S reply to Mr. MASON.'" That is all.

Mr. Speaker, the first RECORD has gone to the country, and I want the corrected RECORD to follow.

It is not sufficient, I repeat, in a case of this kind to correct the permanent RECORD. The RECORD as printed to-day is correct. The printing of the corrected copy harms no one. Of course, the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to save the cost of paper. There are just four pages. I do not think you can make the American people believe that this is purely a matter of trying to save 35 cents and four sheets of paper. [Laughter.] Now, I hope the gentleman, after my explanation, will not insist upon his motion.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. WALSH. I observe the difference in the paragraph which the gentleman has directed attention to and that the lines became transposed; but it does seem to me that the speech ought to go out from one RECORD or the other, and that if the first proceedings are incorrect it will be just to the gentleman to strike it out there.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection to striking out the speech in the first RECORD and letting this other stand. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion that I made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARNER). The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the first remarks in the RECORD containing his reply to the gentleman from Illinois be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. The first insertion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Now I withdraw the motion I made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his motion.

SPRING WHEAT.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the spring-wheat situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. STEENERSON. The hearings on that subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MR. LAGUARDIA IN ITALY.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, a Member of this House whom all of us know, and whom we have learned to respect and admire during the time of his service here, has manifested splendid patriotism by jeopardizing his political fortunes and the pleasure of his service here by taking upon himself the uniform of our country, and for several months he has been serving in Italy in charge of the student flyers of our country there. The Associated Press of this country some weeks ago carried a brief outline of a most remarkable speech made by Representative LAGUARDIA, of whom I am now speaking. [Applause.] This speech was made at Milan, in Italy. Those of us who have not had the privilege of learning the condition of things in the locality of the city of Milan at the time he made this speech, and for many weeks prior thereto, can hardly appreciate the significance of his remarks to his auditors that day, and the meaning those words carried to these people in a region where apprehension prevails, where disaster was imminent, where patriots had begun to lose hope. It appears that shortly after that address a committee of Italians that had been appropriately appointed by the Crown for a certain governmental purpose, and who more particularly represented the Italians of Trentino, a part of Austrian territory but entirely Italian in nationality, addressed a communication to Mr. LAGUARDIA, which reveals much of the Italian thought and contains a distinct message that I think the membership of the House will be glad to hear. I desire, therefore, to ask that the Clerk in my time read this letter which the committee sent to Representative LAGUARDIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Commission of Emigration, Trentino. Organized by virtue of the prefectoral decree of Apr. 12, 1916, and approved by Royal decree July 25, 1916; No. 1142.]

MILAN, February 4, 1918.

To the Hon. Mr. LAGUARDIA,
Member of the American Congress:

The Trentino refugees in Italy no longer have here their former representatives.

The deputy from Trent, Cesare Battisti, after having preached the necessity of the war in all Italian cities, was made a prisoner while fighting and was hung by the Austrians.

The deputies from Rovereto and from the Trentino valleys, the mayors, and the local authorities, and the influential men are in Austria either under sentence or interned. They had not fled, believing it their duty to await at their posts the prompt arrival of the liberating army.

At present, therefore, the Trentino refugees in Italy are forming for themselves a vast association which will unite them all, so that with full authority can be made known to the allies, the Italianism and the right of Trentino to become united to Italy and saved from destruction.

In the meantime the Trentino Commission of Emigration is speaking in their name.

We want the allies all to know that Trentino is a country completely Italian in race, in language, in customs, and that among this solid mass there is not 1 per cent of Teuton; that she has clung desperately to her language; and that her peoples have stood against German violence and German deceit, but that the war has exhausted and destroyed all her material if not yet her moral forces; and that should she be compelled to remain Austrian we would be irremediably obliterated by the renewed exasperated preponderance of our enemies, the Germans; that they have already confiscated our land and our property; they have deported more than a hundred thousand persons from their country to their ruin or death.

Trentino is of no value to Austria other than as an arm for dominating Italy; on the other hand, Italy can never live freely with such a wedge in her heart. We are an honest little people, trampled on and crushed, massacred and dispersed, but who do not wish to perish.

We do not wish to perish, and therefore we must be rescued from Austrian—that is, German—power. We have proclaimed all this loudly, and in the face of danger. There is no need of a new plebiscite. This would be to-day a nasty derision. It has been proclaimed by our deputies elected by universal suffrage. They are dead, incarcerated, or interned, and their voices to-day are stifled. It has been proclaimed by our mayors and our chiefs, including the clergy and the bishop, who shared the same fate. It has been proclaimed by the thousands of citizens condemned for high treason and whose property was confiscated; our prisoners who came from Russia, about 2,000, while many thousands have demanded it who are now in part, perhaps, arriving in America from Siberia; all the deported ones have demanded it, but above all our volunteers who have no voice but who with the ready offer of their lives cry out to the world the will and the needs of Trentino.

All of this we want to say and to prove to the allies and especially to America and to her great President.

We do not presume to think that our words and our grief can influence the decisions of your country, but since Wilson, in one of the most noble programs known to history, has solemnly proclaimed the right of small, oppressed nationalities to live, we want America to know that if there is a little oppressed people, menaced with destruction, solidly Italian, necessary to complete and assure the independence of Italy it is Trentino; that she looks with firm faith to the great American Nation, which proclaims and sustains to-day the rights of peoples, as France and America once proclaimed and sustained the rights of the individual, and that she will not withdraw until a final and complete victory.

We present these considerations to you personally trusting that conforming to your very noble and categorical affirmations for final victory expressed by you, and trusting also to the warm sympathy of America for our country, you will cause to be heard the sorrowful but proud voice of Trentino, ready for every sacrifice, however great, for the triumph of her legitimate and sacred revindication.

ACCOUNTS AND EXPENDITURES OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I move a change of reference of H. Res. 307. This resolution having been referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, I move that it be rereferred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve a point of order on the motion. May I ask the gentleman if it would be agreeable to him and to the House that we have 10 minutes' debate on this subject, in order that the House may know what it is voting on? I would suggest that the gentleman from Georgia be given five minutes in which to state the position of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and that I be given five minutes in which to reply on behalf of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

Mr. BELL. I will say that it would be agreeable to me to make it 10 minutes on a side.

Mr. KEATING. I think five minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be made 20 minutes.

Mr. KEATING. I do not think we are justified in taking up the time of the House to a greater extent than 10 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. That is for the House to decide.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, pending the gentleman's motion, that 10 minutes be allowed on this motion, 5 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] and 5 minutes by myself.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, two or three gentlemen want 4 or 5 minutes each, and I would be glad if the gentleman from Colorado will agree to 10 minutes on a side.

Mr. KEATING. I think the whole thing can be disposed of in 10 minutes.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be 20 minutes debate, 10 minutes to be controlled by myself and 10 minutes by the gentleman from Colorado.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that 20 minutes be allowed for debate, 10 minutes to be controlled by himself and 10 minutes by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BELL. Will the gentleman from Colorado proceed?

Mr. KEATING. No; "the gentleman from Colorado" feels that he should have the last word on this proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Colorado withdraw his point of order which he made but did not state?

Mr. KEATING. I have not.

Mr. WALSH. Then, I make the point of order that we can not discuss this matter with the point of order pending.

Mr. KEATING. The point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to press if we can arrange the matter of debate. The point of order is this: Under the rules of the House a motion to re-refer a bill must be presented immediately after the reading of the Journal. That is the rule. Other business has been permitted to intervene. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] delivered a speech, and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Georgia is not in order. But, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to have the matter decided this morning in order that the question of jurisdiction may be determined. Under that suggestion I feel that my original unanimous-consent request should be granted—that is, that 10 minutes' debate should be allowed, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia and 5 minutes to myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has given unanimous consent for 10 minutes on a side. The Chair does not think that the spirit of the rule has been violated because the House gave unanimous consent to the gentleman from Minnesota, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order and recognizes the gentleman from Georgia for 10 minutes.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution now before the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and upon which that committee has begun an investigation without any authority whatever, had written on the back of the resolution when filed in the basket the following language:

Directing the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to institute an examination of the accounts and expenditures of the Post Office Department, and for other purposes.

That is the entire scope of the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department as stated on the outside of the resolution; and, while I do not believe that it was written on the back of the resolution to deceive the Speaker, it certainly did deceive the Speaker into referring the resolution to a committee that had no jurisdiction over the subject matter of the resolution. The first paragraph of the resolution reads in the same language that I have just read, but all the rest of the resolution deals with questions that are not within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department. For example, it says:

The committee is further directed to institute and carry forward an investigation into the conduct and administration of the affairs of the Post Office Department in so far as they concern and apply to the collection, sorting, forwarding, distribution, and handling in any way of mail of the American Expeditionary Force either in this country or abroad.

The committee is further directed to institute and carry forward an investigation into the conduct and administration of the affairs of the Post Office Department in so far as they concern the mail of any of the organizations of the armies of the United States, either Regular, National, or National Guard, within the confines of the United States or any of its Territories or dependencies.

Then it gives them jurisdiction to institute and carry forward an investigation into the conduct and administration of the affairs of the Post Office Department in so far as they concern the mail between the cities of Washington and New York. It goes further and says:

The committee shall further make such recommendations as to reforms in methods and procedure in the department under investigation as may be justified by the evidence taken and as will affect economy and promote efficiency in the future administration of its affairs.

I submit that this resolution goes beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and that the jurisdiction belongs to the Post Office Committee.

Then it provides that it may appoint a subcommittee, which may administer oaths, appoint experts, send for persons and papers, and may, in effect, reorganize the Post Office Department.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have not seen the resolution nor heard of it, but if what the gentleman says is correct, it increases the jurisdiction and ought to go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MADDEN. This resolution certainly does not belong to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department; but even assuming that it did, I maintain that the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and no other committee of the House, would have authority, by the mere introduction of a resolution, to begin an investigation. It would be compelled to wait until the House had passed the resolution before it assumed authority.

That is not all. It has been said by men on the floor of the House that the reason why they wanted the resolution to remain in the possession of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department is that the Post Office Committee will not investigate. I deny that. I deny the truth of the statement made by any man in this House to the effect that the Post Office Committee will not investigate these matters. The Post Office Committee has never faltered in the performance of its duty. I maintain that the statements to the effect that the Post Office Committee would not investigate are intended to deceive Members of the House in order that they may vote authority for an investigation as to matters over which the Committee on Expenditures has no jurisdiction whatever.

I do not think it is fair. I do not think that any committee ought to investigate until this House authorizes it; and surely this resolution is not in such form to-day that the committee over which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] presides would have the right to begin an investigation. I have no objection to an investigation of the Post Office Department. I would welcome any investigation that the House might order; and, as one member of the Post Office Committee, I would do in this case as I have always done in every case—perform my duty fearlessly, without fear or favor to any man.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FRANCIS], the author of the resolution.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Speaker, as to the indorsement on the resolution, I imagine that was put on it by the Clerk, because the resolution when introduced by me on April 11 had no indorsement whatsoever.

There is a great deal of unnecessary to-do over the jurisdiction of this committee. There is nothing extraordinary or unusual about this resolution. When I sat down to prepare this resolution I took my book of rules to see what the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, of which I am a member, was, and the first paragraph of the resolution is taken verbatim from the statement in the rules of the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANCIS. In a moment. When it comes to the rest of the resolution, I turned back to the records of the House in the Sixty-second Congress, first session, where I found a precedent for the resolution, and that is House resolution No. 109, introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and in substance the entire resolution as I have introduced it at this session is based on the resolution introduced by Mr. SAUNDERS in the Sixty-second Congress. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, was considered by the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and was reported out to this House, and on a unanimous-consent day was adopted by this House, and it is a square precedent. In order to enlighten the Members a little further on this, I shall point out that the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I direct the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this resolution directs an investigation to be made? This resolution has not been passed.

Mr. FRANCIS. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The question is, What authority has the committee to act?

Mr. FRANCIS. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] will answer that. If my resolution is all wrong, then the resolution that was introduced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] was all wrong, for I have followed his resolution.

His resolution provides, first, that the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department shall investigate as to whether abuses exist to the prejudice of the public welfare, and that it shall further investigate the amount of work done and the number of hours devoted by postmasters and officials to their work, and that it shall further investigate the time devoted by postmasters to private enterprise and personal vocation; and, further, what degree of public interest has been disregarded in the establishment and discontinuance of post offices, and finally the extent to which postmasters have contributed to the expenses of political campaigns. The rest of the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], which occupies a page and three-quarters, provides that the committee shall make such recommendations as to reforms in methods and procedure in the department under investigation as may be justified by the evidence taken, and that will effect economy and promote efficiency in the future administration of its affairs. From there on to the end my resolution is taken verbatim from the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia. When the resolution was called up on unanimous-consent day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was in the Chamber, and he asked several critical questions in regard to the resolution; and Mr. SAUNDERS rose to its defense and it went through without any opposition whatsoever; and I submit that my resolution is properly before the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department and should be left there.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANCIS. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. The Saunders resolution, to which the gentleman has referred, related wholly and entirely to past events, did it not?

Mr. FRANCIS. No.

Mr. GORDON. I wish the gentleman would read from some clause there that does not relate to something wholly and entirely in the past, and I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that jurisdiction over expenditures in all of these departments is limited to past events.

Mr. KEATING. How can we investigate expenditures until they have been made? Necessarily they relate to events in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. FRANCIS. The first paragraph provides that the Committee on Expenditures is directed to carry forward an investigation as to whether abuses exist. That refers to the present as well as to the past.

Mr. GORDON. It refers to past expenditures wholly and entirely.

Mr. FRANCIS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say to the gentleman that the first paragraph of this resolution, of course, confines the committee to an investigation of expenditures, and they have that right without any resolution.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. No; I have not the time. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. FRANCIS], the author of the resolution, has stated, he has a perfect precedent in the Saunders resolution adopted by this House in the Sixty-second Congress. That resolution was referred by the Speaker to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, reported back from that committee, adopted by this House, and an investigation held. The Committee on Expenditures of the present House might have taken advantage of this situation, might have met and reported upon this resolution, and in that way have clinched its jurisdiction. We were notified five or six days ago that this question would be raised. We preferred not to indulge in any sharp practice. We wanted the House to settle this question of jurisdiction. The Committte on Expenditures in the Post Office Department is charged with the duty of investigating the expenditures of the Post Office Department. This Congress has granted the Post Office Department a great appropriation for the purpose of establishing a mail service between this country and the expeditionary forces in Europe. How has that money been expended? Has the Post Office Department made good? Are the soldiers in Europe receiving the kind of service that Congress intended the money should provide? I submit that those questions are clearly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and those are the only questions we have attempted to consider.

Gentlemen have said that without waiting for the passage of the resolution we have initiated a hearing, or an "investigation," as they have described it. They confuse a hearing on a resolution which has been referred to a committee with a formal investigation where witnesses may be sworn. The Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, when this resolution was referred to it, undertook to ascertain if there was necessity for the kind of investigation provided in the resolution, and we called upon certain officials of the Post Office Department to appear and give us information as to how they had expended the money provided by Congress for the purpose of furnishing mail service between this country and Europe. We expected to follow that by ascertaining the kind of mail service they had provided for the Army camps.

The committee has proceeded without the suggestion of partisanship. It has not desired to embarrass the Post Office Department or any other department of the Government.

The committee has felt that this House and the people of this country wanted to know what was wrong with the mail service between this country and France, and it has proceeded in a proper fashion to ascertain the material facts. After it has procured sufficient facts upon which to base a report to this House, it will come back to this House and report on this resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think he has authority to investigate under this resolution before the House acts upon the resolution?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from Colorado is not "investigating." The gentleman from Illinois is confusing an investigation with a hearing. Why every committee of this House when a bill or a resolution is referred to it, if the bill or resolution is of sufficient importance, conducts a hearing which will enable members of the committee to determine whether they want to recommend the adoption of the bill or resolution to the House, and that is all the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department has done, and I submit it is well within its jurisdiction.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. GOOD. Is not it true, if it is as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, that if there is a change to be made it ought not to go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads but ought to go to the Committee on Rules; that is, providing any change is to be made at all?

Mr. KEATING. Under the precedents of the House, the precedents established in the Sixty-second Congress by the party now in control of the House, led by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], the place for this resolution is the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and the Speaker or whoever made the reference did exactly right in sending it to that committee. [Applause.]

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I seem to have been drawn in an unexpected fashion into this controversy. It is true that I was the patron of the resolution referred to, but I made no request for the reference of that resolution to the Committee on Expenditures, or to any other committee. It was referred in due course, and the reference was never contested. Hence no precedent has been created. Many bills are erroneously referred. These references are sometimes contested, and sometimes not. In the case of the resolution referred to by the gentleman from New York, I submit that upon the facts an unchallenged reference does not establish the correctness, and propriety of that reference. Given time to make the necessary inquiry, I could point out many references that on motion could have been corrected, if that correction had been desired. Such erroneous references do not create binding precedents. At best they can be regarded as persuasive only. The resolution in question plainly does not belong to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department. Looking to the Manual it will be noted that all subjects relating to the post office, and post roads belong to the Committee on the Post Office. That is a sweeping grant of power. The Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office has a limited jurisdiction, relating to certain defined subjects. That jurisdiction is fixed by the precise and guarded language in the Manual defining the scope of the work of this committee. There is no sweeping grant of power to the Committee on Expenditures. What it may do is summed up under a number of detailed heads. Unquestionably a portion of this resolution relates to powers that belong to the Committee on Expenditures, but I take it as a matter of sound parliamentary law that you can not associate matter that in large degree belongs to one committee, with other matter in lesser degree that belongs to another committee, and then claim jurisdiction of the whole subject matter for the latter committee. Yet that is precisely what is proposed to be done by this resolution. Permit me to read the resolution, because the language used clearly indicates to which of the two committees now contending for jurisdiction, the resolution ought to be referred. The first paragraph unquestionably contains matter that belongs to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department. Reading further, we find the following:

> The committee is further directed to institute and carry forward an investigation into the conduct and administration of the affairs of the Post Office Department in so far as they concern and apply to the collection, sorting, forwarding, distribution, and handling in any way of mail of the American expeditionary forces either in this country or abroad.

The Manual provides that subjects relating to the post office shall be referred to the Post Office Committee. Having that sweeping statement in mind, is there doubt in the mind of any Member of this House, that the investigation proposed in the language cited, is a subject appropriately belonging to the Post Office Committee?

A comprehensive and searching investigation into the administration of the Post Office Department, in an important field is proposed. It is not a matter of figures, of details, of expenditures, of accounts, but of inquiry into general departmental capabilities on a large scale in a wide field. Surely this is a subject relating to the post office. The same comments may be made on the investigations proposed in the paragraphs which follow the paragraph cited. They are not investigations of details of accounts and expenditures, but are inquiries relating to general administration of large activities at home and abroad. The committee to which the general subject of the Post Office Department is committed, should conduct such inquiries.

There is just one further suggestion I wish to make in this connection. If the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department has the right to conduct these investigations, by virtue of the language used in the first paragraph of the resolution, then all that follows that paragraph so far as it relates to the investigations proposed, is surplusage.

If the Committee on Expenditures is entitled to proceed by virtue of the authority afforded by the Manual, then they ought to rest on that language, and content themselves with asking for the power to compel the attendance of witnesses to administer oaths. Obviously the committee distrusted its authority to conduct these specific investigations, and preferred to secure it by specific grant. The resolution associates matters plainly belonging to the Committee on Expenditures, with matter that belongs to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, with a view to conferring jurisdiction of the entire subject matter upon the Committee on Expenditures. More of the matters proposed to be done by this resolution belong to the Committee on Post Offices, than to the Committee on Expenditures. Hence as between these committees, this resolution should be referred to the Post Office Committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] has a minute and a half left.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Without interfering with the gentleman from Georgia, is it agreeable to the gentleman?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect, I think I must object to that. We must go on.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. All I want to do is to speak in the interest of orderly procedure. I am not at all interested in the contest between the two committees.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I only take the floor to speak in the interest of orderly procedure. It is a matter of indifference to me to which committee this may go, the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department or the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. But, as a matter of fact, under the practice of the House this resolution ought to go to the Committee on Rules. Why? Because it seeks to extend the power of one of the regular standing committees of the House, whether it be the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads or the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, and in order to extend that power and authority, then, in the regular way, it ought to go to the Committee on Rules and be reported from that committee.

For instance, on page 3 it says:

The committee is further empowered to employ, from time to time, such stenographers as may be necessary—

And so forth.

That part of it would probably go to the Committee on Accounts, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FRANCIS] will doubtless look after that when the time comes. It authorizes the administration of oaths. Under the unbroken practice, wherever there has been a contest, in order to obtain additional power under the rules, such resolutions as this have been referred to the Committee on Rules and reported from that committee.

Now, it is a matter of indifference to me. As I say, I only speak in the interest of orderly procedure, and it seems to me the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] might very well change his motion and refer it to the Committee on Rules rather than the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, because exactly the same question would arise again if it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to ask a question for my own satisfaction. Where a resolution or bill has matter that is within the jurisdiction of one committee and also subject matter that is clearly within the jurisdiction of another committee, how is the committee to which the resolution or bill should be referred determined?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Those questions often arise, but those are legislative propositions, if the gentleman will permit. This is not a legislative proposition. This is a question of investigation and the question of power to be conferred upon a committee. This does not involve legislation in any way. It involves the question of what power should be given to a committee, and for that reason ought to go to the Committee on Rules, the regular committee of the House that deals with those matters.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Any investigation that has to be conducted in this matter has to take in three departments, the War Department, the Post Office Department, and the transportation department in France. Now, the sole question in my mind is, which committee has full powers to conduct such an investigation, as there are 37,000 bags of mail over there at one of the ports, belonging to the American troops, undistributed at the present time.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit, we really have not reached that stage yet. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] stated that such hearings as have been had were wholly for the purpose of determining whether this resolution should be reported to the House, if I understood the gentleman correctly.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We have not reached that stage of investigation as yet, except on the question of whether the resolution should be reported to the House and acted upon by the House.

Mr. KEATING. If there was a state of affairs that would justify it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And that being the case, I submit to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL], in the interests of orderly procedure it ought to go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. A parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask the Chair if it would be possible, under the existing conditions, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads having directed the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] to move to transfer this bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for him to move to send the resolution to the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The opinion of the Chair is that it would not be in order unless the chairman of the committee would authorize him to move that it go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. As it can not be amended on the floor, the gentleman can not ask for another reference. He could ask unanimous consent, if desired, to have it referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] could withdraw his motion, and if to-morrow morning the committee offered a resolution to refer it, they could refer it there.

The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has expired. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I can not tell whether or not this resolution should be referred to the Committee on Rules. But it is very clear and evident to my mind that it does not belong to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department. There is but one portion of this resolution that the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department has any jurisdiction over whatever, and that is the first paragraph. This is a sweeping resolution, and it empowers the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to investigate the conduct and the administration of affairs of the Post Office Department in domestic and foreign mails. This they have no jurisdiction over whatever. It has been intimated, so I am informed, and I believe said——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BELL. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman were a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department how would he proceed to investigate the expenditures in the foreign mail service that he has referred to without finding out how the money was expended?

Mr. BELL. I would go to the Post Office Department for the information.

Mr. KEATING. That is what the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department has done. That is all that it has done.

Mr. BELL. It is further stated that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads would not make the investigation. We resent that. We would, but we would not until the resolution is referred to our committee. When that is done we will make an investigation. I think we have jurisdiction over it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, pending the putting of the motion, I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado objects. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL].

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KEATING. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 91.

Mr. BELL. I ask for tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks for tellers.

Mr MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll. Those who favor the motion of the gentleman from Georgia will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 156, nays 151, answered "present" 9, not voting 114, as follows:

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. MASON. I am not absolutely sure whether I was or not. I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote. I am not sure that I can bring myself within the rule. I was behind the railing and had just come in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, was this a call of the House or just a roll call?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A yea-and-nay vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This resolution goes to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to was laid on the table.

HERVEY E. DAMERON (H. REPT. NO. 518).

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 321.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Hervey E. Dameron, clerk to WILLIAM A. JONES, a Representative from the State of Virginia at the time of his death, April 17, 1918, the sum of $166.66, being an amount equal to one month's salary of a clerk of a Representative in Congress.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

BERT W. KENNEDY AND FRANK W. COLLIER (H. REPT. NO. 519).

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I offer another privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 315.

Resolved, That the salaries of the messengers to the minority, Bert W. Kennedy and Frank W. Collier, be increased to $1,800 each: Provided, That the said increase be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, there are four of these messengers who do the same service, two of whom draw $1,800, and this is to equalize the pay of the others.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. We could not hear what the gentleman from Georgia said.

Mr. PARK. I stated that there are four of these men who perform similar service, two of whom get $1,800 and the others $1,500. This resolution is to equalize their pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield. I will say that we are all acquainted with the worthy gentlemen, Messrs. Kennedy and Collier, whose salaries this resolution seeks to increase. I wish to inquire whether the committee has made any investigation as to whether this will occasion an increase of the salaries of other employees performing similar duties?

Mr. PARK. Nothing like that has been discussed in the committee, and I know of nothing of that kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. For instance, there is on the Republican side Mr. Chaffee, who has charge of the telephone booths, and who is engaged from before the House convenes until its close in very exacting service. He receives a salary of $1,500. There are other employees of the House, perhaps on the Democratic side, who perform like service, who are receiving $1,500. I wish to inquire whether the Committee on Accounts have considered any general raise of the salaries of the employees of the House?

Mr. PARK. No; we are not considering any.

Mr. STAFFORD. And whether this will be used as a precedent to increase the salaries of other employees of the House?

Mr. PARK. We only consider those matters when they are introduced in the regular way and referred to the committee through the regular channel. The committee has not discussed or considered anything of the kind indicated by the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman recognize the need of increasing the salaries of other employees of the House if we are going to increase the salaries of some?

Mr. PARK. We will consider that when we come to it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee has not considered it up to the present time?

Mr. PARK. It has not been called to our attention.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that on our side of the House there are five men, three of whom receive $1,800. The other two receive $1,500. They do practically the same work.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am now pointing out another gentleman who does even more exacting work. That is the telephone page, Mr. Chaffee, who receives $1,500.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have no objection to increasing his salary, but I am speaking now of these two men, who are old employees. I have no objection to anyone having a raise who is entitled to it. I know of no reason why these two men should not have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of my inquiry is to ascertain whether the committee have made any investigation as to general increases of the salaries of House employees, or whether they are just singling out a few worthy employees for increases.

Mr. PARK. I have answered the gentleman three or four times. The matter has not been called to the attention of the committee, and, so far as I know, has not been called to the attention of any member of the committee. We are simply seeking to do for that side what was done for this side.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the chairman of the committee, the majority employees performing the same service are receiving $1,800, and it is now proposed to give these minority employees the same amount?

Mr. PARK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. KITCHIN. One of the gentlemen who has been mentioned by the gentleman from Wisconsin had his salary increased from $1,200 to $1,500 in the last session.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am quite aware of that fact; but I am also quite well aware of the fact that the gentleman who is performing even more exacting duties than the gentlemen whose salaries have been advanced is receiving only $1,500.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution raises the salaries of what two employees?

Mr. PARK. Mr. Kennedy and Mr. Collier.

Mr. FERRIS. I know Mr. Kennedy, but I do not know Mr. Collier.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman does not know him by name, but he sees him here every day. I introduced this resolution. I knew nothing about the other employees. The committee acted upon the resolution at my request. I asked for only two raises. I have no objection to others, of course.

Mr. FERRIS. I wanted to inquire of the chairman of the committee if there has been any effort to equalize the salaries of the assistant clerks to committees?

Mr. PARK. That matter has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. For example, the assistant clerk to my committee, which is a busy committee, only gets $1,200. You can not hold an assistant clerk any longer at that salary. I have used the salary, giving half to a messenger and half to another clerk in order to get along. I find that almost all of the other assistant clerks are getting $1,500 to $1,800. I am not complaining, but it seems to me that some time the salaries of these clerks ought to be equalized so that the assistant clerks will get the same pay. I wondered if the gentleman had given any attention to this class of employees.

Mr. PARK. No; it has not been called to the attention of the committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL (H. REPT. NO. 515).

Mr. SISSON, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported a bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and with accompanying papers referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. STAFFORD reserved all points of order on the bill.

THE REGISTRATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of S. J. Res. 124, providing for the registration of young men who have become 21 since the 5th day of June, 1917.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of S. J. Res. 124, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if it is absolutely necessary that this legislation should be brought about now in order to supply an army of the United States?

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that that is the opinion of the War Department. They expect to have this registration on the 5th of June, the anniversary of the first draft, and unless this bill becomes a law shortly the machinery can not be put into operation.

Mr. FOSTER. I asked that question for the reason that by a special rule we have a bill which I am very desirous of having disposed of at the earliest date possible. Of course, if the War Department says that in order to secure this army it is necessary for this legislation to be passed now, I shall be obliged to give way.

Mr. DENT. I will state further that if there is no objection to the present consideration of this resolution, I propose to submit another request which will limit debate to two hours, and that is agreed to by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that as soon as this is disposed of it will be in order to take up the other matter which I referred to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the present opinion of the occupant of the chair.

Mr. FOSTER. With the statement of the gentleman from Alabama that the War Department believes that this legislation is necessary to secure an army, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other half by myself; that during the debate such amendments may be offered as any Member desires; and that at the expiration of two hours of debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all pending amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate on this resolution be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the other half by himself, and that during the general debate amendments may be offered, and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments to final passage. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know what amendments may be offered, and I have no objection to having a vote at the end of two hours' debate on the bill. As I say, I have no information of what amendments may be offered, but an amendment might be offered that should be debated under the five-minute rule. Is the gentleman aware as to whether amendments will be offered?

Mr. DENT. I only know of two amendments that are likely to be offered outside of the committee amendments. One relates to the action of the Military Committee of the House in striking out that part of the Senate resolution which exempts divinity and medical students, and the other is an amendment which was offered in the committee, which is not a part of the resolution, providing that those who are registered under this resolution shall go to the foot of the list.

Mr. DOWELL. I did not hear what the gentleman said the first one was.

Mr. DENT. The first one relates to the action of the House in striking out the exemption of divinity and medical students.

Mr. CANNON. That has not been enacted.

Mr. DENT. No; but the gentleman asked me what amendments I thought would be offered.

Mr. CANNON. That is a subject for consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DENT. This bill is on the House Calendar.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman can move the previous question at any time. These amendments might give rise to debate where a number of Members would want a little time.

Mr. DENT. If we can have a general understanding in regard to it, I do not believe that the debate is going to last two hours. There is no member of the committee on the Democratic side who has asked me for any time, and I know of nobody that wants any, except on one amendment. I do not know that the debate will last two hours, but if anything should happen by which any amendment is offered, or anything that should develop that is not now anticipated, there will be no difficulty in extending the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

Resolved, etc., That all male persons, citizens of the United States or residing in the United States, who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, and that upon proclamation by the President, stating the time and place of such registration, it shall be the duty of all such persons, except such persons as in said proclamation may be exempted from registration, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of the act approved May 18, 1917, and they shall be registered in the same manner and subject to the same requirements and liabilities as those previously registered under the terms of said act.

SEC. 2. That after the day set under section 1 hereof for the registration by proclamation by the President at such intervals as the President may from time to time prescribe, the President may require that all male persons, citizens of the United States or residing in the United States, who have attained the age of 21 years since the last preceding date of registration, and on or before the next day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, except such persons as in the proclamation by the President stating the time and place of such registration may be exempted from registration, shall be registered in the same manner and subject to the same requirements and liabilities as those previously registered under the terms of said act: Provided, That students who are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and students who are preparing for the practice of medicine and surgery in recognized medical schools, at the time of the approval of this act shall be exempt from the selective draft prescribed in the act of May 18, 1917; and that students entering such theological or divinity schools after the approval of this act and during the continuance of the war, and who would be subject to any future registration as provided for in this act, may upon the recommendation or request of the president or dean of such school be exempt from the selective draft by order of the President.

SEC. 3. That all such persons when registered shall be liable to military service and to draft under the terms of said act approved May 18, 1917, under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of said act.

SEC. 4. That all such persons shall be subject to the terms and provisions and liabilities of said act approved May 18, 1917, in all respects as if they had been registered under the terms of said act, and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of said act and of this joint resolution upon the publication of any such proclamation by the President.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "States," strike out the word "or" and insert the words "and all male persons."

Page 2, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "in said proclamation may be exempted from registration" and insert the words "are exempt from registration under the act of May 18, 1917, and any act or acts amendatory thereof."

Page 2, line 12, strike out the word "the" where it occurs the second time in the line and insert the word "said."

Page 2, line 21, after the word "States," strike out the word "or" and insert the words "and all male persons."

Page 2, line 25, and page 3, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "in the proclamation by the President stating the time and place of such registration may be exempted from registration" and insert the words "are exempt from registration under the act of May 18, 1917, and any act or acts amendatory thereof."

Page 3, line 7, after the word "act," strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I think this resolution is so well understood by the House that a very brief statement of it only is necessary. It provides, in short, that there shall be registered and subject to the draft all young men arriving at the age of 21 years since the 5th day of July of last year, and automatically each year during the present emergency. The House Committee on Military Affairs amended the resolution as passed by the Senate by limiting its provisions to the present emergency, so that it will be perfectly manifest that it is war legislation and intended only for this emergency. The second amendment proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, striking out the word "or" in line 4 and inserting the words "and all male persons," was intended manifestly, as appears upon its face, to get a registration, although not liable to military service, of all persons, including aliens, in the country within this age, which would not have been done under the resolution as passed by the Senate. The next amendment on page 2 changes the language in the resolution as passed by the Senate. The language of the resolution as passed by the Senate excepts from the registration such persons as in said proclamation of the President may be exempted from registration. I do not know and the committee did not know whether or not that was intended to enlarge the power of the President to add to those exempted from registration, but the Committee thought that the language should be more specific and clear and provide for the exemption of those who were exempted from registration under the original draft, and such is the effect of that amendment. The only other amendment is the amendment striking out the proviso exempting theological and medical students from registration.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman state who were exempted under the original act?

Mr. DENT. The Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, regularly or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of the act were preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And the committee restricted the exemption list which is given to the President to the original list?

Mr. DENT. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the very clear statement made by the chairman of the committee, I do not desire to take up any of the time of the House at this time, but I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW].

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a statement from the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, which I ask to have read in my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The war shipping committee of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, in the face of the present necessity for proper housing of workmen at Hog Island made manifest by the action of the Emergency Fleet Corporation in commandeering homes in West Philadelphia, wish to call the attention of the citizens of Philadelphia and their Congressmen, as well as the officers of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, to the great need of pushing forward in some form the project of building houses in the available districts of West and South Philadelphia.

The building season is now at hand, and the work should be commenced promptly in order that the houses should be available at the earliest possible date.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, a situation has recently arisen in Philadelphia of sufficient importance, I feel, to engage the attention of the House. It involves an unfortunate and congested condition, due to efforts to house our new shipyard employees. Last week several hundred citizens of the section of Philadelphia known as West Philadelphia met in Liberty Hall to discuss ways and means to prevent real estate speculators from depriving the tenants in that locality of their homes. I may say that this locality is adjacent to the Hog Island Shipyard, and near those other great war industrial plants such as the Baldwin Locomotive Works, the Remington Arms Co., the Westinghouse, and numerous others, and the demand for houses there has become extreme.

Following that meeting hundreds of protests have come to me as the Representative of that district saying that the writers had been ordered to either buy these houses or vacate. A certain number of days have been given for the tenants to purchase or get out. On Monday last I joined a delegation of these people and met the United States district attorney, Mr. Kane, in the Federal building. We found in the list of those who are being evicted many Government employees, men who are working at the Hog Island plant, men who are working on the railroads, letter carriers, and families dependent upon husbands, sons, or brothers who are in the service. There was one particularly pathetic case in this list among many others. This was the case of a woman who has three sons upon whom she was entirely dependent. One of the sons is with the Army in France, another is in the draft, and the third one is in the hospital. This woman was notified that within so many days she must either purchase the house in which she lives or get out on the street. I told her to absolutely ignore the notice, no matter from what source it came, as she was protected by the soldiers' and sailors' civil rights law, and that advice was confirmed by the United States district attorney.

Now, the proposition, it seems to me, is this: Owing to the vast number of people coming into this section to work in the various Government plants there are not houses enough to take care of them, and real estate men, who are willing to trade upon the necessities of the people, have evidently been taking advantage of this situation. It would seem from these hundreds of communications, which set forth the complaints of the citizens, that real estate operators to a certain extent have agreed among themselves to turn these people out in order that they may sell these houses at increased prices or secure a higher rental. I felt as if this was only a profiteering conspiracy on the part of real estate operators, but it now seems to have developed into a commandeering proposition on the part of the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

This morning I called upon Mr. Hurley, president of the Shipping Board, and he tells me that they have commandeered 500 houses in that locality; that it is not their purpose to take houses that are occupied, but only to take houses in the course of erection and those that are vacant. But I must confess I can not fully see the difference between compelling or having some one else to cause these people to vacate these houses, whether done directly or indirectly by the Emergency Fleet Corporation. These people are a patriotic people. They have, as far as their limited means would permit, subscribed to the liberty bonds, and they have been told that if they can buy liberty bonds they can buy houses. It is impossible, however, with the limited amount of money that they can save to purchase houses. They may not, and some of them are not, able to meet these terms, but they can and do buy $50 or $100 bonds, as I know from many cases that have come to my attention. I do not wish to criticize the Shipping Board; in fact, I have been one who has on all occasions commended their work, especially in the Hog Island plant. The amount of work they have done there under adverse circumstances is almost beyond the belief of man, and the great progress made so overreaches and overlaps the mistakes and extravagance they have made that it is entitled to our commendation and not to our condemnation. But in this matter I can not help but feel that an error has been made. The board was given an opportunity to erect houses, and I think that is the only solution——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. DARROW. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What has become of the housing proposition itself?

Mr. DARROW. The authority has been given, and I think that this is one of the points where it was recognized to be needed more than any other. I think for some unforeseen reason the housing program has been, temporarily at least, set aside and that they have not proceeded along that line.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has been a patriotic Member of the House, and I know he has been a defender of the purposes of the Shipping Board and would not make a complaint unless he felt warranted in doing it. May I ask the gentleman if it is not true that the Emergency Fleet Corporation, or at least the American International Corporation, started this housing business, so far as planning is concerned, at least three months ago, but has not produced any houses up to date?

Mr. DARROW. I think the gentleman is quite correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DARROW. May I have two or three minutes more?

Mr. KAHN. I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I would like to send this editorial from one of our newspapers to the desk and have it read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield at that point for one more question?

Mr. DARROW. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is a matter of such grave importance in connection with the general housing plan I think it ought to be clearly understood. The Shipping Board has had the power to go ahead with the housing for some time. The law was enacted and, I think, went into effect the 1st of March, giving power to commandeer or construct, and so forth; yet nothing has been done in the matter of house construction up to the present time. As a matter of fact, building plans have been changed, and transportation arrangements have been negotiated with a view of using houses already occupied rather than to construct new ones. That is the fact.

Mr. DARROW. So I understand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether or not the Shipping Board has abandoned its plans of erecting houses near by the yard?

Mr. DARROW. I understand the Shipping Board decided or gave out yesterday or to-day that they would probably go ahead now and build some houses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some additional houses? And meanwhile the fact is that the occupants of the houses in West Philadelphia, some of whose sons are already in the public service or in France, and some of whom are already doing war work for the Government, are facing eviction.

Mr. DARROW. That is true.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DARROW. May I have five minutes additional?

Mr. KAHN. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. DARROW. I would ask that the editorial be read. It is from the Philadelphia Inquirer of yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The editorial will be read in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEIZING HOUSES FOR HOG ISLAND WORKERS.

For months the Emergency Fleet Corporation amused itself by drawing plans for the erection of houses for Hog Island workers. Tired of its game, it now seizes houses over the heads of tenants and turns them into the streets to hunt for other houses which have no existence.

It is a serious matter, this eviction, and wholly without justification, since dwellings could and should have been erected by wholesale long ago. The resort to it is but another evidence of the incompetency that has stamped itself all over the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the Federal Shipping Board from the start.

Building operations have practically ceased in this city, and the demand for dwellings far outruns the supply. Only the Government can build. Only the Government can command the materials and the labor. It should have attended to the needs of Hog Island by constructive methods. Instead, the Emergency Fleet Corporation has played with red tape and wasted weeks upon weeks of valuable time, only to deprive numerous families of the roofs that have sheltered them.

Surely it was high time that Mr. Schwab was brought in to build ships. It is a pity that he was not brought in long ago and given authority to build houses as well.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I only have introduced this editorial to show the situation there, not that I approve of all the criticisms made, though I do think that paper has the reputation of being conservative and not given to extreme statements; but the people are aroused, and I felt that it was time something was done to relieve the situation and begin the construction of houses that have been authorized by Congress.

Mr. FESS. Will my friend yield?

Mr. DARROW. I will.

Mr. FESS. In the statement that the gentleman does not approve of all that the editorial states, the gentleman does, however, approve of the statement that the country will have confidence now of what the Shipbuilding Corporation will do under the leadership of Mr. Schwab.

Mr. DARROW. Absolutely; not that they may not have had that confidence before, but they will feel doubly secure now. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. I think so.

Mr. DARROW. I yield back the remainder of my time to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, how much time does the gentleman yield back?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman used four minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], the chairman of the committee, now use some of his time?

Mr. DENT. I will say that I do not know as anyone on this side desires time. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] desires time, I will yield to him.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of one of these gentlemen in charge of this bill. First, how many men will this bill furnish?

Mr. KAHN. It is estimated there will be between 700,000 and 1,000,000 men who will be registered under the bill.

Mr. DENT. Annually.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is stated here in the letter appended to the committee report, signed by the Secretary of War, that this new classification plan of the War Department will segregate in class 1 those registrants who can serve the Nation with the least possible disturbance of the economic conditions. Is it the intention to classify in class 1 all of these young men who have attained the age of 21 since the registration day under the selective-draft law?

Mr. KAHN. They will all be given the questionnaires, and they will fill them out as the registrants have done heretofore. Then the local boards will classify them accordingly.

Mr. ROBBINS. They will be classified under the act of May 18, 1917—known as the general draft law?

Mr. KAHN. No. They will be classified in accordance with the bill that was passed here the other day, the quota bill. They will be given questionnaires, just as the registrants under the first registration law were given them, and according to their answers to the questionnaires they will be classified.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. FESS. Under this bill, if the annual increment to the Army would be from 700,000 to 1,000,000, after all exemptions are taken, what is the estimate of the increment of actual fighting soldiers?

Mr. KAHN. Well, the War Department, of course, can not give us more than just an estimate. It is probable that we can depend upon 500,000 to 700,000 men ready to go to the colors.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, Col. Repington made the statement that Germany could not put in action, with all exemptions counted out and ascertained, of the age of from 16 to 18, more than 440,000 a year, while Great Britain would put in probably 350,000 and France 250,000, exempting all classes of legal exemption. If that statement were true, and if this army is to be an army of that number, it looks favorable to us.

Mr. KAHN. How true the figures are that come out of Germany I do not know. There was an article in the newspapers the other day to the effect that Germany was just calling out her class of 1918 or 1919, and that 550,000 soldiers were included in that class. Now, those are German soldiers; but the armies of the central powers also include the soldiers of Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria. How many soldiers these countries will be able to furnish every year I do not know. The 550,000 referred to in the dispatches are Germans, so that I take it the central powers will be able to furnish a great many more than 400,000 soldiers a year.

Mr. FESS. Would the 550,000 count out exemptions?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, yes.

Mr. FESS. You mean 550,000 fighting men?

Mr. KAHN. According to the cablegrams that were printed, it means 550,000 men who have been trained and who are now going into the army—trained men trained under the German system.

Mr. FESS. We certainly can beat Germany on numbers.

Mr. KAHN. There is no doubt but that we are going to beat Germany in every way. [Applause.] But the sooner we begin raising armies to do it the quicker we will be able to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. I agree with you on that.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Washington is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs as to the status of Senate bill 3426, the commandeering bill, which, I understand, passed the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DENT. What is the title?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The bill is known as the commandeering bill. Its purpose is the taking over by the Government of sawmills, logging camps, logging lands, and the like. I have a telegram from a prominent logging operator in Hoquiam, Wash., which is the center of the spruce industry and where millions of feet of that stock are being gotten out at breakneck speed for aeroplane stock. He telegraphs that Col. Brice P. Disque, who represents the Government in the United States Signal Corps, with headquarters at Portland, Oreg., and who is in complete charge of the spruce production, is greatly hampered for lack of this commandeer law.

Col. Disque, it seems, needs this law in order to take timber from lands of nonresident owners, for commandeering rights of way and the like, and for the cutting of red tape. When I first heard of that bill, which was introduced by Senator CHAMBERLAIN, I felt there would be opposition in the timber country by the timber owners to its far-reaching powers, but I concluded that if Col. Disque needed such a law I would assist in pressing it as a war necessity. This I am prepared to do in spite of its radical features. It pleases me to learn that such men as the author of this telegram, Mr. Polson, are quick to sink any personal objections and to call for action on the part of the House, inasmuch as the Senate has already acted. Therefore I ask the distinguished gentleman from Alabama about the present status of the bill.

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman that when that bill passed the Senate and came over to the House it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and I took the position that the Committee on Military Affairs did not have jurisdiction of the subject matter. But the Speaker having referred it to us, and nobody seeming to care for it, it was allowed to remain with our committee, but no formal action was taken by the committee, and from the sentiment of the committee I question whether any favorable action will be taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am free to say that I thought that the bill would be found in another committee. I desire to ask the gentleman if the bill has been looked upon as a war necessity, or rather, has it been called for by the War Department?

Mr. DENT. We have had absolutely nothing from the War Department in relation to it at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then I take it that the bill is not likely to come soon to the House Calendar. If, however, the committee sees fit at any time to revive the bill, I shall be glad to present the statements of Mr. Polson and others and to secure a statement in detail from Col. Disque. Before taking my seat, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I believe that all of those in authority at the War Department and elsewhere engaged in pressing the war to a successful conclusion are well informed as to the great speeding-up process that has gone steadily for a solid year in the district which I have the honor to represent. Personal differences have disappeared out there. Personal objections to laws which seem drastic are not made. Red tape is quickly cut. Action is the thing. We are delivering the goods. Aberdeen turned over the first Government contract wooden ship in the United States. Hoquiam has furnished spruce stock faster than it could be used. Tacoma gave the site for the largest cantonment, and built it first, cheapest, and best, and the 10 counties in my district were the first in the State of Washington to report their third liberty-loan quota oversubscribed. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman will be reported for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HULL of Iowa offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 16, after the word "act," insert:

"Provided, That those persons registered under the provisions of this act shall be placed at the bottom of the list of those liable for military service in the several classes to which they are assigned, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Is this amendment to be considered as now pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent. That was the understanding.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the Speaker said, "Without objection, it will be reported for information."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was an inadvertence.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to take up very much of your time. The amendment explains itself. It seems to me the only fair way to induct these young men into the service is to place them where they naturally come. Unless you do this and the War Department should adopt a proposed plan of its own, this will happen: In some districts there is quite a list of waiting men who have been selected for six or eight months. Their liability to military service has been fixed. The whole community knows where they come in. They are all anxious to go and ready to go. They have had time to prepare themselves. Now you are going to pass a law to bring some young men into the service. Most of these young men are going to school to-day. They know nothing about what we are doing down here, and on the day of registration or a few days before they come to the age of 21. Of course, they come under the provisions of this act. Now, if the War Department adopts its plan, in your district and in my district some of these young men, by chance, of course, will be placed at the head of the list. He will have to drop his school work and go to war before those who have had their liability to military service fixed for nearly 10 months. This is unfair to the young man, and will be so construed by the people back home.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Under this new plan will the liability to service of these young men be determined by drawing out numbered pellets as heretofore?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes. In either case it is only a question as to which plan you take, whether you put these men at the bottom of the list or let them take a chance to come in at the head of the list. I say it is unjust to the men who have already been selected, and it is unjust to the men you are going to select.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The War Department does not oppose this plan that the gentleman suggests?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. The War Department is not opposed to it, and Gen. Crowder is not opposed to it. However, he has thought of a different plan. I want to read to you his testimony on this very point. It is in the hearings. I asked him:

Mr. HULL. Assuming the bill is passed, would there be any objection on the part of the department to having these boys drawn in at the end of class 1, instead of mixing them in as a whole? It would not change the effectiveness of the law, but it does seem to me it would look a little bit better to the country than it would if you mixed them all in at once.

Gen. CROWDER. I do not know how that would appeal to the country, but I do not see any objection to it.

There are two ways of doing it. Yours is one way and mine is the other. I do not know whether the country would want to follow this new class with any special solicitude and defer their being called until all the men now in class 1 were exhausted or whether they would prefer to see them integrated at once. As the bill is drawn, we can pursue either method, and in the absence of direction by Congress we will consider both methods. I only mention the other way as the way that has commended itself to my judgment. I can not see any special equity in the man who has become 21 years of age since June 5.

Mr. HULL. In all probability, if we did not direct you, you would mix them right in?

Gen. CROWDER. I would go before the Secretary of War and explain it to him and take his direction in regard to it. Just at present I am inclined to favor the direct integrating of the two classes.

Mr. HULL. You would not object to Congress putting these men at the end of class 1?

Gen. CROWDER. No.

So you can see that he is very positive there.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Referring to the statement made by the gentleman a few moments ago about certain individuals in each registration district having been already listed, as he knows, to go if the War Department's plan or Gen. Crowder's should be adopted, is it likely that he would put any of these new registrants in ahead of those who have already been cited to appear?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly. That is his very plan, to have two numbers, one set up of those who have already been listed, and another of these new registrants. And if by chance, as will probably happen, a man in your district is drawn at the head of the list, that young man goes ahead of those who are already listed.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But these men who have already been listed to go have been drawn already?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, would not these young men be deferred anyhow until after those who have been listed heretofore have gone?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly not, if Gen. Crowder's plan is adopted. It is the right of this Congress to say which plan they prefer, and now is the time. If you adopt my amendment, that can not happen. It is to prevent this very thing that I advocate its passage.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think the gentleman will agree that the rule is that the older a man is the more useful he is, both to his family and to the community industrially. Now, what is the merit of taking the men all the way up to 31 and sending them first, when they have responsibilities and are useful to their dependents and to the various industries, while saving to the end those who are without responsibilities, and who are not so useful?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Because you have previously selected them. The gentleman's argument would lead to the drafting of boys under 21, in order that we might leave older ones already chosen at home.

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; we limited it to those above 21.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, well, that may come; that is, the drafting of boys under 21.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply desire to ask my colleague if in offering this amendment he does so because he believes it will be the best for the military service of our country, or for the Military Establishment, or if he is prompted in offering this amendment by the solicitude which he may have for certain individuals?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that it is as a military measure I advocate this amendment. To win this war we must, in my opinion, keep the masses of the people enthusiastic for war, and one of the ways to do this is to convince them that we are treating those who must bear the burden fairly in all ways.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. In answering the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] the gentleman said, "Oh, you are in favor of enlisting the men under 21," and then wound up by saying, "Perhaps that will come." Of course the gentleman realizes that we are in war and that we have got to win the war, and if the time should ever come in this country when it will be necessary to take the young men under 21 in order to fill our armies, does the gentleman mean to have it understood that he will refuse to vote for their enrollment?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I certainly shall not when that time comes, but I shall as long as we can find men able to go who are older than that. We should all give heed to the advice of the War Department, but when in our own opinion they are making a mistake we should fearlessly stand up and call the attention of this representative body to the same. I am willing to make any sacrifice, even to the last drop of our blood, in order to win this war; but I appeal to you to proceed in a decent manner, conserving our strength and manliness in all ways.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Having entered into this subject, which is an interesting one, will the gentleman state if, in his opinion, men older than 21 are by reason of that fact better fitted to perform military service than are young men of 20?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman two minutes to answer that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes additional.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Why does the gentleman oppose training young men of 20, and why does he favor training young men over 21? Is military efficiency promoted by men who are over 21 in preference to those who are only 20?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that I am now opposing training men under 21; that is not the question at all. I simply believe it is better to use older ones, and when you do draft the younger blood put it in where it belongs or treat it as a human being having some rights. Older men are better fighters.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Upon what does the gentleman base that statement?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. On the testimony of men who have been at the front in Europe, that the form of warfare there to-day breaks down young men, that it takes older men to perform it.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. I want to ask the gentleman if there has ever been any testimony introduced before our committee in support of the theory that a lot of fellows have got, that boys under 20 are better soldiers than men up to 40?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think there has been some testimony along this line, but it is all mixed up with the question of volunteers so much that I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. GORDON. But nobody proposes to draft minors, except for training, do they?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not yet.

Mr. GORDON. No.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to call the attention of the gentlemen here to the fact that unless you adopt this amendment—if the War Department adopts their plan—you in your districts will be appealed to to save some young man for a few months until he can get ready. You will say then that you have not got the power and that you can do nothing. You have the power to-day, and it is a perfectly fair proposition for you to adopt this amendment. The War Department does not object to it. Do not be afraid of what people are saying about you back in your district; stand up and vote your own convictions; it is better to have your own self-esteem and to know that you have tried to do what you considered right in times of stress like these than it is to be reelected. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, on the face of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] in his amendment to put at the foot of the class the men who will be drawn under the provisions of this resolution as coming of age since the last registration was made, there is a very natural appeal to the sentimental aspects of the subject. On its face it would seem as if that were the fair way to manage the business. If one did not go down below these superficial aspects very deeply it might even carry conviction as a matter of course that the obvious logic of the situation was that the young man who comes in last should be drawn last. It is true, moreover, that the Provost Marshal General has said that it did not make any particular difference to him which way it was done. That, of course, is a very easy statement for the Provost Marshal General to make under the circumstances, inasmuch as Congress having passed a law it is his business to carry out the law in the way it is passed, and in this respect, at least, it really does not make any difference to him. It is also obvious from the statement that was read by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] that the Provost Marshal General did have a preferential method which he hopes to carry out. The ultimate effect of either method probably will not be such as to disturb the real military man power that the country will have at any given date, so that in general terms the Provost Marshal General might easily waive it aside for the present, knowing that if it did begin to affect the situation seriously there would be some way out under military exigency or the power of Congress to give him affirmative authority to make the change. And it is much easier to have this resolution go through and get the boys in anyway than to spend much time in fixing just what should be done with them afterwards.

Now, it seems to me that doing this thing in a practical manner, dismissing for the time being solicitude for the boys when they become 21, dismissing the sentimentality that may attach to it, and coming down to the practical, cold-blooded consideration of the solemn and appalling fact that we are engaged in a life and death struggle of this Nation in the most awful war of recorded history; coming down to that as the premise from which we shall reason, it seems to me that we ought to give the soldiers to the Army with the least possible restrictions on the use to be made of them by the military commanders. It seems to me that we ought to give our soldiers to the country unhampered and unfettered by any needless restrictions as to just when and where and how and in what time they may be used.

It may be argued, as I have suggested, that this is a very small matter; that it simply puts a little farther down the calendar the right to use A as related to the time that B and other men drawn before him are to be used. And yet it is conceivable that under such exigencies as might arise the War Department might want to reach its hand out and gather up any number of men within a certain age, with certain qualifications, that would correspond to particular requisites for military service, and coming down the list find itself obstructed by an apparently innocuous clause inserted in a resolution saying that you can not touch the boys you want to use now until other men you do not want to use have been used before them.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Is not the gentleman giving an erroneous construction to this amendment? There is nothing in the amendment that requires them to use men they do not want to use before they use those that they do want.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have not intentionally.

Mr. GORDON. There is nothing in it to prevent their calling the man to-morrow after the man they have drafted before.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman has answered his own question.

Mr. GORDON. If they are in the same class; and ought not that to be done?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman does not see it I have wasted my time. The very purpose of putting these men at the foot of the list is to compel the use of other men before they are called. I say that there should be no needless restrictions on the power of the department to use any man anywhere and at any time. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, there is no military question involved in this amendment. It will not affect the number of men that are to be drawn. The Military Establishment will get just as many men under one plan as under the other. It is a question for Congress to decide whether the men of the first draft shall be called before the men of the succeeding drafts shall be called, or whether the men of later drafts shall be integrated into the first draft and taken along with the men of that draft.

I think I violate no confidence when I say that this amendment was a tie vote in committee. There was as much argument in the committee for it as against it.

Here is the proposition that Gen. Crowder said that to his mind would appeal to him, although he did not oppose this one. His plan is to integrate the new classes into the old, and he will give the men of the new draft order numbers the same as he did under the draft of June 5, 1917, except that the order number will be 1 "a," 2 "a," 500 "a," and so on down the line. Then when he draws number 1 of the 1917 register, number 1 "a" of the 1918 register goes in with him. When he draws 500 under the 1917 register he will draw 500 "a" under the 1918 registration, and so on down the line.

If that plan is pursued here is what will happen in some cases. If the war continues three or four years some men of the 1917 registration will still remain uncalled, while some of the 1920 and 1921 registration will be immediately called. I believe it is a good business proposition, and I believe it is best for the Army to draw from the oldest class first. As I have said, it does not affect the number of men, but it makes conditions more satisfactory in the country, and in my opinion the Army more effective. We will know how many men are unexhausted in class 1. When the new registration is had and they will know from reports how many men are likely to be called, and when the class will be reached, and young men will not be so disturbed in their school courses or in learning their respective trades or professions. They will be permitted oftentimes to complete their education by calling in their stead men who are 25 or 28 or 30 years old. I say it will make conditions more satisfactory in the country, and in my opinion it will be best for the Military Establishment. Some men, both in and out of the Military Establishment, have wanted to fight this war from the start with boys under 21. This bill as reported does not propose that very thing, but it borders close on to it and is a step in the direction of that principle, hence the necessity of this amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the operation of the draft law all those who have become 21 years of age since the last registration, and those taken under the first draft who will be 32 and 33, will still be subject to the draft under the original registration.

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. If this amendment be adopted, would it not result in having men 32 and 33 years of age who are beyond the draft age being called before men who are 21 and 22 years of age, coming under this 1918 registration, would be called, if they fall within class 1?

Mr. FIELDS. Let us take it from that viewpoint. The man who is 31 years of age in class 1 is, generally speaking, unattached.

Mr. BARKLEY. He may not be unattached.

Mr. FIELDS. He is, as a rule, or he would not have been put into class 1. He is under the same obligation to his Government as the man who is 21. Why would it not be better to call him and let the man who is 21, who probably has not completed his education, go ahead and complete his education? Then there is another viewpoint. There is a class of men in the country who are unattached, who drift about from place to place, while the boy 21 years of age is on the farm or at home, as a rule.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that; but why should we be any more solicitous now of the boy who is just arriving at 21 than we were last year of the boys who then arrived at 21 years of age, and many of whom were called and are now in the Army?

Mr. FIELDS. I make no distinction between them. A man who was 21 on the 6th day of June last year is to-day under the same obligation to his Government as the man who was 21 on the 4th day of June; but as between calling men who are 29 or 30 years of age, and who are in class 1, and men who are 21 years of age and who have not completed their education, I would call the older men, and I think it is fair and right. Then there is another point worth considering. The country will know under my plan exactly what the result will be if we work from the head of the class, utilizing the older registrants first. I believe that any business institution would take that view of it, and I think it will make conditions better throughout the country. I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will be adopted by the House.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I understand that the desire of those supporting the amendment will be to permit those who are coming 21 to continue their college work. It goes without saying that most of them have finished high-school work, because the high-school age would not extend to 21 years.

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I have a little doubt in my mind as to just how effectively a college boy can work after he is put into class 1, and he knows that the draft is likely to take him. I am of opinion that he can not do anything, and he might as well go to the Army at once.

Mr. FIELDS. That does not mean that the boys will quit entering college. They should be given all the advantages that can be given to them, without interfering with the effectiveness of the Military Establishment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it the gentleman's idea that a man who already has those superior social opportunities and benefits in life which enable him to go to college, for instance, shall be put into that other classification not included in Gen. Crowder's questionnaire, "to him that hath to him shall be given," and that he shall be benefited by this thing just because he is already getting more than 90 per cent of the rest of the boys get normally?

Mr. FIELDS. No. I said a moment ago that the country boy of 21 is on the farm, and if the gentleman wants me to be frank about it I will say that it means much to the agricultural interests of this country to have him remain on the farm as long as possible and to have some definite knowledge if possible as to when his call will come. The adoption of this amendment will produce that result to a great extent.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It also means a good deal to the agriculturists and all others to have a country to work in at all, does it not?

Mr. FIELDS. We should consider the effectiveness of the Military Establishment first, but it does not affect the effectiveness of the Military Establishment whether you select the one plan or the other, except that the plan that I advocate will give to the Army more mature men than will the other plan.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It simply means that you have needlessly tied around the War Department's control of these men some hampering strings, which do not affect the Military Establishment, the gentleman says?

Mr. FIELDS. Not at all. The Military Establishment will have authority to call just as many men under one plan as under the other.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And yet affect the use of the people in it.

Mr. FIELDS. Not at all.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Then why tie them on?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is there any larger proportion of these boys who are 21 on the farm than there are of men in class 1 who are now between 25 and 30 years of age that are on the farm?

Mr. FIELDS. That is my contention, and I think I am correct, because men drift off into public works as they advance in years.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the gentleman will find that the closer a man is to 30, the more settled he is. If he is on a farm, the more likely he is to stay there.

Mr. FIELDS. We know that at first the country child is on the farm, and he is at home, but as he grows older he drifts out into his chosen profession or vocation; therefore the man of 21 who is reared on the farm is more apt to be on the farm than is the man of 30 who is unmarried or unsettled in life.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. When we are choosing between men of 30 or 31 and men of 21, is it not fair to conclude that the man who has become 30 years of age and who has not become essential, industrially or socially, who has no family, is a better man to put into the ranks than the boy who is just coming 21 years of age, who has had no opportunity whatever?

Mr. FIELDS. I thank the gentleman from Nebraska for raising that question. I intended to allude to it, but I was interrupted. Here is another proposition, from a military point of view: These men who are now 30 years old are growing away from their efficiency; they are growing away from the military service. Suppose the war goes on for 8 or 10 years and you utilize young men in their stead, and 10 years from now they have become incapacitated, in part, by age and the young man, who would be in the prime of life, has been taken to the Army. Would it not be a better business proposition, would it not be a better military proposition, to use the man who is growing out of his military usefulness first? Is it not conserving the military strength of the country to begin at the head of the class and work down? There is no argument on earth against it. The man of 21 has 10 years longer to live, 10 years more of usefulness ahead of him, than the man of 31.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not my colleague favor the proposition of enrolling all men between the ages of 21 and 40?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; I voted for it last year.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not that answer the argument that the gentleman is making?

Mr. FIELDS. But we have not done that; we are dealing with conditions that confront us at this time.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FIELDS. I am delighted always to yield to my friend.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I thank the gentleman. What is to become——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FIELDS. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, now this argument resolves itself into this. The chairman says that Gen. Crowder will do it by regulations if he does not change his mind, but, of course, he changes his mind sometimes. A year ago, with great circumstance and eclat, we had a drawing which was supposed to fix the order in which everybody who was registered should be called into the military service, and did fix that order. Of course it fixed the order of some who did not want to serve and resulted in some friction and objection, and in order to meet that objection the bill was amended in certain respects. I do not intend to discuss that, because I am not going to thrash over ground that we have already passed. I do say that there is no argument that can be made either upon the ground of military efficiency or any other ground, no legitimate argument that can be made against this amendment. As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] just stated before he left the floor the men who were registered last year are under the provisions of law liable to render military service whenever called, and those who are unattached or have waived all exemptions are put in class 1, and they are there now, and this proposition would permit under regulations to be adopted any time anybody in the War Department thought best, to defer these men who are in class 1, and put in these boys who have just become 21 years of age. I think the action of the Congress in repudiating the result of the drawing was very unwise, but that has been done. If that drawing, which everybody conceded was the fairest thing connected with the administration of the draft law, had continued in force nobody would seriously have proposed taking these boys who become 21 years old after the registration was had and put them in ahead of anybody older in years who is in the same class. Now, it seems to me for every possible reason that anybody can think of the older man should be taken first because, according to the contention of some gentlemen when a man gets to be 30—and Congress adopted that maximum age limit upon the theory that a man over 30 was not so good for military service as a man under it—if that is true, do you not believe you are conserving the military strength of the country by taking these older men rather than the youngest men you can lay your hands on?

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. If that theory is correct, why not direct the War Department to take the man of 31 before the man of 30 is taken and to take the man of 30 before the man of 29, and come on down the list of the different classes?

Mr. GORDON. That is the question that was thrashed out when this draft law was enacted. It was thought best not to take men between 21 and 40 for reasons satisfactory to the military authorities, although the proposition to eliminate the age limits of 21 to 40 only got six votes in this House. There were only six men who stood up here and voted for the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] to make the age 19 to 25. Of course, the plan at that time was to draft all those between 19 and 25, and the army of the first 1,000,000 men was to be made of boys 19 and 20 years of age. I wonder how many men in the American Congress to-day would be proud to hold up their heads if the 1,000,000 men, or whatever the number is we have over there, were boys of 19 and 20 years of age?

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentlemen's theory is correct and the age limit was from 21 to 40, then we ought to take the man of 40 before we come to the man of 39, and so on down.

Mr. GORDON. Not at all. You take them in the order they were drawn. They are all equally liable for military service, and the Congress stated that a man between the age of 21 and 30, inclusive, was liable, but the obligation is equal upon all in that classification.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. When the gentleman says the obligation is equal on all men in a class, then why does he give those boys who have become 21 a preferred situation?

Mr. GORDON. Because when we passed the draft law we said they were not liable to military service. We are passing a new law that provides that when they shall have arrived at the minimum military-service age they shall become liable.

Now, if we are doing that, why not allow them to come in in the regular way in which they grow into military service?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In the original allotment men of 21 had to take their chances with men of 31 as to whether they went at the head of the list or not. Why not now?

Mr. GORDON. They do not now. If you had voted with me they would have taken their chances in a drawing of lots, but under the law now and this joint resolution, these boys can be put in ahead of those drafted a year ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to have some man point out one logical reason consistent with the votes already cast by this House, against this amendment. There is not any. The only argument I have heard that had any force at all is the statement of the chairman of the committee to the effect that he did not care much about it, because Crowder said he was going to do it anyway. The trouble is, Crowder changes his mind sometimes.

Mr. KAHN. So does the President.

Mr. GORDON. All men do. If anybody can give me one reason against this amendment I will vote against it.

Mr. McKENZIE. Can my colleague give any good reason, from a military standpoint, why these boys that are going to be registered now should be put in a preferred class?

Mr. GORDON. This does not put them in a preferred class. It simply puts them into the military service after the men that we declared a year ago are the men that ought to fight for us. The best military reason I can think of is the reason that actuated you when you voted for the bill to fix the age for military service between 21 and 31. I do not agree that 30 years is the highest point. I think men under 40 are better men to fight than boys under 20. Do not make any mistake about my position. I am talking to men who voted for this draft law which made 30 the maximum age limit, but who want to put boys in now, so that a lot of these fellows will grow out of their military obligation. And I do not want to do that.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will state my question in another way. Can my colleague give any good military reason why these men who are to be registered should not be integrated with those in class 1?

Mr. GORDON. They have not become of the age. This Congress says we ought to impose military service upon them, too, some of them, and I say when they shall become of that age they ought to go in the order in which they are drafted. We drafted the other men a year ago——

Mr. McKENZIE. If my colleague will pardon me, he has not answered my question. What I want to know is, whether you or anyone advocating this amendment can give any good military reason why these boys who have arrived at the age of 21 should not be integrated now with the men now drafted?

Mr. GORDON. I will give you one definite reason and it is this: That the older men are better men for the military service than boys of 21.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Who says so?

Mr. GORDON. I say so. This bill applies to men who are not yet of age.

Now, of course we could stand here and argue all summer about the question of whether men under 40 are better men for soldiers than boys under 20, but I think it is a foolish proposition for any man of common sense to try to argue, especially in a war like this.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This is merely a good-natured suggestion. You do not mean to leave the impression that this bill applies only to men of 21?

Mr. GORDON. It applies to everyone who has reached 21 since June 5, 1917, or may hereafter do so.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. I will.

Mr. FIELDS. If the men of the older ages in the draft to-day are not as effective as the men of 21, they will still be less effective two or three or four years from now.

Mr. GORDON. Of course they are growing more ineffective all the time as they are getting older.

Mr. BARKLEY. Let us take two boys, one who is 21 on the 4th of June and the other one 21 on the 6th day of June.

Mr. GORDON. That is an example of the maxim "De minimis non curat lex."

Mr. BARKLEY. The first was compelled to register; the second did not register. Now, can the gentleman point out any reason in fairness why one of those boys by reason of the difference of two days in their birthdays should be given deferred classification?

Mr. GORDON. No; and this does not give him a deferred classification. Of course, you have got to adopt some arbitrary rule. Congress said it did not propose to draft boys to send to Europe until they were of age. Congress was appealed to for 21 years as a minimum. I think the reasons excellent. Of course, if you are going to split hairs by talking about one that became 21 before registration day and the other 21 on the day after, that is not practical. The obligation is equal, except that the law made one liable and did not make the other one liable. You have got to adopt some arbitrary rule. What do you say about a man who became 31 on the 4th day of June? The latter is liable under the present law and is a year older than he was then. Why not put him in, then, if he is in class 1? He is drafted and has known it for a year. Congress has imposed this liability and burden upon him. It applies to those boys, every one of them, that have become of age since the 5th of last June, and will apply to everyone in the future who becomes 21 years of age.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened here to my good friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON]. The Hull amendment came up in the committee, and I took the view there that I take here, that it could accomplish no good purpose, and that it is nonsensical sentimentality.

We are in a war and a serious war. The resolution that this Congress passed a few days ago provided that all of class 1 throughout the entire Republic should be exhausted before class 2 should be invaded in any bailiwick in the United States. Now, this resolution before the House provides that every young man who has reached the age of 21 years since the 5th day of June, 1917, the registration day, shall at once become subject to the draft law.

And let me animadvert, my friends, for one moment to the proposition that the draft law is now the policy of the Nation. We should lay aside our views as to a volunteer army. My good friend from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] and myself both entertained those views when we had the original draft law up, but after we were whipped and the Democratic majority on the committee was whipped on the floor of this House, I say, as Democrats and patriots, it is the duty of all of us to stand behind this administration and stand behind the War Department and amend this draft law just as the President and the War Department desire. I shall stand for that throughout the war.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield now.

Mr. FIELDS. This proposition was not up at that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. QUIN. The proposition before us now is to get the most men in class 1 available for service in the Army without in anywise hampering the farms, the industries, and the other productive activities of this Republic during the progress of this great war. How else could it be done, and how better could it be done than to take in this million young men who have become of age since June 5 last and place them in the general pot of the draft, to be called into the Army whenever the Government needs them? No doubt three-fourths of those will be placed in class 1. Those young men without any dependents upon them will be placed in class 1, and why should they be deferred down to the bottom class? All of the men who reach the age of 21 years in this Republic each and all owe the same duty to this Government to go and fight its battles and follow its flag, in France or anywhere else. If they all owe that duty, why is it that the Government should put in a special-privileged class the boy who did not happen to be 21 years of age on June 5, 1917, but who has reached that age since then?

As a military proposition, my friend from Ohio said he would ask any man to assign a single reason against the Hull amendment. I can assign several against it. I say that the law and the Government owes no more right or privilege to any one citizen than it does to another; that a man who is 25 years of age and in class 1 owes no more to this Government than the man who is now 21 years of age; and the War Department wants to put all of them into a general hodgepodge to fill up class 1, so that nowhere will poor men be called away from their families, from their wives and children, so that no man who is really essential on the farm in producing food for the people of this Republic and to maintain our armies shall be taken, so that no man who is essential in the production of ships shall be taken, and——

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield. I would love to yield to the gentleman, but I can not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. QUIN. So that those I have just mentioned will not be taken away from those industries. And for that reason we need to have a surplus in class 1, that can be drawn from all the time. And, my friends, this is no little matter. This is an important matter. In my judgment, the War Department is exactly right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Can the gentleman from Alabama give me five minutes more?

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if I may.

Mr. DENT. Can the gentleman get along with three minutes?

Mr. QUIN. I will try to.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Just for one question.

Mr. QUIN. I would love to yield to my friend, but all I have is three minutes, and I would like to discuss this matter.

Mr. KNUTSON. I will not insist on it, then.

Mr. QUIN. I thank my good friend. [Laughter.] The proposition that the War Department put before our committee and which the committee brought here is for the best military interests of this country. It is for the best industrial interests of this country. It is for the best interests of every farm in this Republic and it is for the best interests of all the people of the United States; and certainly, in my judgment, it is the one thing that we should do to perfect this draft law, so that a hardship will be worked upon no one. The young men who have reached the age of 21 since the 5th of June last year all owe to the Government the same responsibility as the man who is 31, and they can be best spared from the farm and from the industries to go to the fighting line, and obviate the taking away of poor farming and laboring men who have whiskers on their faces and a whole lot of little children around their hearthstones requiring to be fed and clothed. [Applause.]

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. This does not propose any more.

Mr. QUIN. The effect of it is that, and my friend from Kentucky knows it is bound to be that. The effect of this resolution—and if any man will analyze it he is bound to see that that will be the result—the effect will be to take the men who have no responsibilities upon them. It would take the men who can be free to go and fight without disturbing home relations, except their fathers and mothers, of course.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not true that when the first draft was drawn the boy who was then 21 and eligible had to take his chance, whether he would be one of the first drawn in the numbers and go to the head of the list?

Mr. QUIN. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not fair that these young men should take the same chance?

Mr. QUIN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. You have abolished the drawing. They did not take any chance.

Mr. QUIN. We must get an effective army without destroying the industries of this country. Every man in this House knows that from one end of the country to the other the cry came, "Do not take the man off the farm; we must raise food." The War Department, knowing that, asked us to pass this bill, so that they will have a reservoir of men there and that the farmers who are married will be left untouched and will produce the necessary food.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Has the drawing been abolished?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] three minutes of my time.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Has the drawing been abolished?

Mr. QUIN. No, sir. The draft law is operating now just as it did when we began. The trouble about it is that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] has that sentimental idea running through his mind that you owe more to the boy of 21 years of age than you do the man 25 years of age. I can see that there is some reason for that in sentiment, but when you are in a cyclone you are going to run into the first place of safety.

We are in great danger, and we need this reservoir of young men to draw upon.

Mr. GORDON. Do you think we will get away from this cyclone by taking the men of 21 rather than the men of 31 in the same class?

Mr. QUIN. The man of 31 is going to be taken, like the boy of 21.

Mr. GORDON. No; he is not.

Mr. QUIN. That is what the law provides.

Mr. GORDON. No; that is what our amendment provides—for taking the men of 31 first.

Mr. QUIN. You want to exhaust all of them before you take a single one who has become of age since the 5th of June, 1917. That is nonsense. It can not be for the best interests of this Government. It can not be the military reason. The military reason is to take every man who becomes 21 years of age and place him in the general hotchpotch, to be drawn upon to fight for this country. Who opposes that? When you take a young man 21 years old you do not take a man away from his wife and children but you take a single man without anything to keep him back home, except, of course, his love for his father and mother and brothers and sisters.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. QUIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Is the gentleman in favor of taking a young man of 21 years of age and depriving him of the opportunity to develop himself, to perfect himself in a trade or profession?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, my goodness, my friend! We can not stop to talk now about developing ourselves in trades. We need men to fight on the western line in Europe. The English are being driven back, the French are being driven back, the Americans are being killed and wounded, and yet we talk here about giving some man time to learn a trade.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Give me another minute.

Mr. KAHN. I do not want to destroy that peroration, and I will give the gentleman another minute. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Talk about developing, talk about going to school when our flag is about to drag in the dirt! When the Germans, who propose to destroy our civilization and take away our property, our liberties, and our lives, are pushing forward upon us you propose to allow men above 21 years of age to be talking about going to school or sitting around in the parlor. They ought to be willing and ready to go out and follow their flag and go over the top anywhere for this Government. [Applause.] This is no time for us to talk about young men over 21 years old wanting to go to school. Why, we understand that all men would love to be at home. All men would love the opportunities of developing themselves, to become intellectual giants or statesmen or great men in the world's affairs, but the duty they owe their Government is to protect the Nation, so that all, poor and rich, high and low alike, may serve the Government that, in turn, will protect their liberties. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, practically all the battles of this country have been fought by boys under 21. This Congress has decided that the battles of this country hereafter shall be fought by men over 21. There is no particular hurry, then, why we should grab the boy the minute he is 21 and shove him into the firing line. The battle fields of the Republic, from Bunker Hill to Guiguinto, are rose red and crimson with the heart's blood of boys 16 to 21. What is the hurry to have them take their turn at bat now when there is a million older in the line that is waiting? Who was it that fought and fell from Gettysburg to Franklin, at Chancellorsville and Vicksburg, at Mission Ridge and Pea Ridge? The volunteer whose heroic figure and immortal fame will live forever, even though you have given him a discharge "without honor." You can see the little volunteer yet.

> Out of the focal and foremost fire,
> Out of the hospital walls as dire,
> Smitten of grapeshot and gangrene,
> Eighteenth battle and he sixteen,
> Specter such as you seldom see,

The minute he is 21 you want to throw him into the firing line. The gentleman from Illinois asks, Is there any good military reason why men of 31 should not be sent to the firing line before boys of 21? Why, surely. Anybody can tell that. Let us put it on a cold-blooded business basis, if the gentleman wishes. The boy of 21 has 10 years longer to live for the Republic and fight for the Republic, and to be used on the firing line, than the other one. The sensible plan is to preserve him and his 10 extra years—use the one that will last the least time. Why shove him in and get him killed at the same time that the boy of 31 goes in? In a few years the boy of 31 will cease to be useful, and long after that, when he is dead and gone, you can use the boy of 21. Lose a man of 30 and you lose 20 years. Lose a boy of 21 and you lose 30 years. Conserve him on the same principle that young trees are not cut down. Which is it that you strike down, the monarch of the forest or the little sapling? Why, the question answers itself.

The gentleman and soldier from Vermont stated it very aptly when he said that, in the first place, if you thought about it of course it seemed natural that you should let the boy of 21 wait; that, in effect, anybody of any sense of course would naturally expect to keep the boy of 21 until the last. And then he proceeded to argue the seal off the bond, a thing which he is mighty handy at doing. He can always give a good reason for anything. I marveled at his ability as a debater to tell why we should not take them. But suppose you were a man of 31 on the firing line, and suppose you had a brother of 21 on the firing line with you. Suppose they called for volunteers for a forlorn hope, which of you would go? If you were any man at all, you would go and send your mother's younger boy back to wait until the next time. That is what this Republic expects these men to do. It expects that the men of 31 will go first to the firing line, while it conserves the young strength of the youth of the Republic, which will last longer. Of course that is the sensible thing to do. There are enough boys of 16 to 21 lying in their graves who fought for the Republic and died for the Republic before they became of age and before they could have any mature judgment. Why should not the men of 21, who could vote when war was declared, and the men up to 31 go before the boys of 19 and 20, who did not have anything to say about it? There is plenty of patriotism in this Republic, and half the boys of 16 to 21 would be in the Army now if you would let them. You know that an army of volunteers would be full of boys. You voted against it. The men of 31 are patriotic. They have sound judgment and good sense, and they do their duty when you ask them, and they will want you to conserve our resources in the natural way, as the gentleman from Vermont suggested.

I have a matter in that connection to which I want to call your attention. There is plenty of patriotism in this country. Thank God, the American Republic is sound to the core and practically all of its citizens are loyal citizens. Ninety-five per cent of the Croatians in Kansas City, Kans., have bought liberty bonds, I learned to-day. I find a very curious thing here. It seems we have not even got to depend upon the boys of 19 or 20. We have agitated the woman question so much that we have gotten a response. It seems that the English send the boys into the firing line and appoint young women as army field clerks, from the letter I shall read.

I made a little talk here on the 9th of March as to the difference between men who go out and fight for their country and men who wear uniforms in the departments. Here is a letter from Miss Blanche A. O'Connor, who is in the department Judge Advocate's office in Chicago. I thought uniforms and shoulder straps were for fighting men, not for civilians with no military training doing civilian's work. That men in uniforms and shoulder straps should share the dangers of their comrades if they shared their honors. Yesterday the National Association of the Daughters of 1812 resolved to put no star on the service flag except for those who risk their lives or propose to risk their lives for their country. Miss O'Connor is of their opinion.

She refers to my talk in the House March 9, and says:

CHICAGO, March 29, 1918.

Hon. E. C. LITTLE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have read with a great deal of interest your discussion in a recent issue of the Army and Navy Gazette, and was particularly impressed with the following statement:

"The principal business of the American Army is to win the war. This war is not going to be won in Washington. * * * It is going to be won on the firing line. As far as I am concerned, I would like to see an order made to-morrow that every man with a uniform on in Washington be sent to the front, where they ought to be. This is not a place for soldiers."

As a woman Army field clerk, I also believe that the war can not be won in Chicago, and am taking the liberty of asking your good offices, in behalf of women Army field clerks for the following reasons:

In August, 1917, I was sworn in as a temporary Army field clerk to serve for the period of the war. I have been admitted to the Illinois bar three years, but being an experienced stenographer I desired to serve my country in some way. At that time the colonel judge advocate in charge believed that the place of men was in the field, and consequently women were employed in the office. Since that time three women have resigned and their places have been filled by young men within draft age. These young men were holding good positions when they were employed as Army field clerks, but I do not think it would be tactful or discreet, on my part, to say why I think they left civilian life to enter the service in this way. The fact remains that we have a large number of Army field clerks in Chicago in officers' uniform—young men within draft age. Their status is between that of an officer and an enlisted man. Their duties are purely clerical, and are such as can be performed by a woman, and in most instances better.

I would welcome an assignment to foreign service, as doubtless many other women now in the service would. I am equipped, I believe, both mentally and physically, for the work, and have a fairly accurate knowledge of the French language. Up to this time, however, the War Department has detailed only men in this capacity for overseas service. The woman Army field clerk has a military status, and to assign them to foreign service, particularly in the branch offices of the Army, would not be an untried experiment as to the fitness and capability of women, as is borne out by the fact that women are detailed in the Army and Navy Female Nurse Corps; the Surgeon General has made a recent ruling that women may be employed as bacteriologists and laboratory assistants; Gen. Pershing has called for contingents of telephone operators, and the branch offices of our Army in France, I believe, already have employed French women. All these units of women have been, and are now being, assigned to duties far more dangerous than would be the work of an Army field clerk. The morale of the Army has also been enhanced by the employment of women, as can be seen by the work of the women's canteen committee, Salvation Army, and other units, which have been working in the war zone.

The work which I am doing here in the central department could easily be filled by a woman who is a cripple or who has obligations which would prevent her from going to the front, and as my father served four years in the Confederate Army, and my mother saw four brothers volunteer in the Union ranks, I am necessarily of the opinion that every American young woman, physically able and who has had training in the military offices, should be sent to the front in the same manner as the women in England are employed, and more particularly at this critical time when men are so badly needed in the combatant forces.

Assuring you that I should, indeed, appreciate an indorsement on your part of the advisability of the employment of women Army field clerks in foreign service that I may leave the patriotic young men in this office "alone in their glory," "to pursue the even tenor of their ways," I remain,

Very respectfully, yours, BLANCHE A. O'CONNOR.

CHICAGO, April 7, 1918.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN LITTLE: I wish to thank you for your letter of April 2, and its kind expressions on my behalf.

I am glad to inclose an affidavit as to my service in the War Department of the United States Army, acknowledgment by The Adjutant General of the Army of my application for foreign service, and also copy of telegram appointing me from the civil-service list of lawyers to the position of law clerk in Washington. I have, however, declined the appointment, believing that the place of every American woman, with the requisite qualifications in the military service, is at the front, that no one may accuse her of not heeding the Biblical admonition of "Whosoever has set his hand to the plow, and turning back, is not fit to enter the Kingdom."

You will note that at the time my application was made some two months ago the department did not contemplate assigning women to duty in France. That they are employed almost exclusively in the base armies of the allies, more particularly England, would seem to be one of the logical reasons to be advanced for their being assigned by the United States Government.

* * * * * * *

Again assuring you of my appreciation of your efforts in behalf of women Army field clerks for their appointment to over-seas service, and of my utmost confidence in the outcome, I am

Very respectfully, yours,

BLANCHE A. O'CONNOR.

Mr. Speaker, there are in the departments many young men who would be glad to be relieved from the monotony of department work even if in uniform and proud of an opportunity to go to the front as their brothers and fathers and grandfathers before them. If there be those there who are reluctant; if there be those who are satisfied to work in bomb-proof safety, the newspapers have announced, since March 9, that the Chief of Staff has said men who were seeking to evade actual service and men who can well be spared would soon be sent from Washington. The young lady from Chicago in this letter I lay before the House suggests the plan by which the one can be spared and the other's wish be granted. She tells us that the English have women Army field clerks. She appears as the first volunteer for that service in the American Army, the sister in arms of those admirable nurses who have made so sweet and so gallant a record with our troops on a thousand fields. As she sensibly suggests, clerical work can be done here and at the front by women as well as by men, and every soldier can be spared for the shock of war. That her name is O'Connor is somewhat significant; that name is not unknown in the annals of war.

Already, gentlemen, all our young men hear the summons to the field, and our old men the rumble of the guns they have heard before. The call has been heard in the hearts of their sisters, and this letter spread on your records will tell the world for a thousand years that our people stand shoulder to shoulder to stake the last dollar, the last man, and the last woman that this mightiest Republic shall conquer or perish for those principles of equity and liberty which are the corner stones of human rights and a Christian civilization. Mr. Speaker, I want the House and the world to know that the women are ready to go to the front. Let the Huns take notice they fight a united Nation as in the brave days of old. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from California, but before doing that I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Alabama for his courtesy in yielding me this time, but the subject I desire to speak upon would take more than five minutes. I wish to talk seriously on the question of the preservation of the dead bodies of our soldiers. I have some data on that subject that I would like to present. I realize that this bill ought to be passed, and am in sympathy with the gentleman in charge of the bill in urging and hastening its passage. Therefore I yield back the balance of my time

Mr. DENT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much interest to this discussion. I am prepared to vote, so far as I am concerned, and do not know that I can make any statement that will cause anybody to vote as I do. I have constituents that will come in the 21-year-old class and some in the 31-year-old class, and all the way between. I think I shall vote for this amendment, and for this reason: Class 1a is the first to be called, and then you can take all the way through class 1. I am not an expert in military affairs, but all of them, I take it, are to be drawn before you come to class 2.

There are several classes that are exempt. For instance, if a man is unmarried and has dependents he is exempt. If a man is married, under certain conditions—and he is apt to be dependent unless he is awfully well heeled; then there are certain callings that are exempt, certain portions of the farmers, mechanics, and so on, as I understand it, and I wish to be corrected if I am wrong. Now, the man that is exempt, and if in class a 1, 2, 3, and 4, is a man that does not have any dependents and does not come in as a farmer or a mechanic and be exempt on that account. If he is healthy and passes the doctor, does not have dependents at all, is not exempt, I do not see why that man should not be called before the boy that is 21 years old on the 3d of June next, if that is the date.

That is all I want to say about it, therefore I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman does not mean to assume that all married men who have families dependent upon them are exempt?

Mr. GORDON. They are if they claim it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; nothing like it.

Mr. CANNON. If they have dependents they are substantially exempt. I said that I was not an expert touching military affairs, but I apprehend that if they have dependents they are exempt. Anyway I am willing to let the boy that becomes 21 early in June next, if he is called—and class 1 will not be called for a year—I am willing that he shall have that additional year either to go to school or work on the farm or otherwise. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN].

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, much has been said on the floor of this House and by the newspapers throughout the country in relation to the number of commissioned officers on duty in the departments here in Washington, and I believe that there is a misunderstanding both among the Members of this House and the people of the country as to the actual number and class of officers that are on duty here.

Those statements have placed all these officers who are compelled to remain here on duty under the embarrassment of being in the class of slackers or of having been taken from civil life through political influence and given commissions for the purpose of avoiding military service in the field.

Such statements, I believe, are unfair and unjust to the brave, patriotic, and highly efficient officers who are compelled, much against their own will, to remain here in order to perform the important duties to which they have been assigned. So in order to have the correct information for the Members of the House and place these officers in the proper light before the people of the country, I requested Adjutant McCain for a statement of the number of men and the branch of the Army to which they are attached, which I now ask the Clerk to read.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 25, 1918.

Hon. JOHN M. MORIN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In response to your recent request for information relative to commissioned officers who have been assigned to duty in Washington in connection with the work of the various staff corps and departments, I have the honor to advise you as follows:

There has apparently been considerable misapprehension regarding both the kind of work performed by officers on staff duty and the number of them detailed in Washington. The public in general seems to be under the impression that staff duty and purely clerical duty are one and the same thing and that the work could be performed as well by a civilian as by a commissioned officer; in short, that a staff officer is nothing other than a clerk in uniform. Moreover, the number of officers on duty in Washington is generally believed to be much larger than it really is, owing to the tempotary presence here of officers making personal reports to the department or on furlough from near-by camps and also, perhaps, because the novelty of the sight of an officer's uniform has not yet worn off and an exaggerated notion as to their number results.

The following figures have been compiled to show the total number of commissioned officers in the various staff corps and departments of the Army on March 23, 1918, and the number of these who were detailed for duty in Washington:

	Total.	On duty in Washington.
General Staff	165	79
Adjutant General's Department	331	47
Inspector General's Department	105	25
Quartermaster Corps	6,628	603
Engineer Corps	5,807	332
Ordnance Department	4,284	1,880
Signal Corps:
Line Section	1,511	91
Aviation Section	8,825	525
Medical Corps	[1]24,425	534
Dental Corps	[1]5,628	13
Veterinary Corps	[1]1,803	15
Judge Advocate General's Department	165	42
Militia Bureau	7	7
Bureau of Insular Affairs	3	3
Chaplains	662	.....
Professors, Military Academy	7	.....
Director of Civilian Marksmanship	1	1
Total	60,357	4,198

[1] Only 16,979 commissioned officers of the Medical Corps, 1,814 of the Dental Corps, and 185 of the Veterinary Corps were on active duty March 23, 1918.

Of the total of 60,357 officers included in this summary it will be observed that 32,690, or over one-half, are in the Medical, Dental, and Veterinary Corps, in the Judge Advocate General's Department, professors at the United States Military Academy, and chaplains. Included in the list are also the executive chiefs of the various staff corps and departments and the officers of long military experience who act as their assistants and advisers. It certainly can not be held that the duties of these trained soldiers, physicians, dentists, lawyers, clergymen, etc., are susceptible of being performed by civilian clerks.

The Signal Corps is also included in the above summary as part of the staff of the Army, but the greater part of its commissioned personnel of 10,336 officers will eventually see active duty of the most dangerous character. A similar statement is applicable also in the case of the 5,807 officers of the Engineer Corps, which corps, it should be stated, is properly part of the line of the Army and not of the staff.

The present war has developed into a war of specialists. History affords us no precedent of the sort, and the presence in the armies of to-day of considerable numbers of highly trained specialists in mechanical, chemical, and other technical and scientific lines has become an absolute necessity. A considerable proportion of the balance of the number shown above is made up of these, notably in the cases of the Ordnance Department and the Quartermaster Corps.

In the comparatively few cases where Army officers are performing duties of a strictly clerical nature, it is to be observed that the work required of them is so highly confidential and demands such long hours that it has been deemed to be in the best interests of the service to place it in the hands of men amenable to military discipline. There is also a very limited number of instances of commissions having been granted to men of high standing in the business world and trained experts in their particular lines, who responded patriotically to the Government's appeal with a tender of their services. The services of these men are of great value to the department, and the granting to them of commissions in the Army in return therefor appeared to be the only adequate way of meeting their cases.

As shown above, there were, on the 23d instant, 4,198 staff officers actually on duty in Washington. The larger part of this number is made up of officers on purely temporary duty. The number varies considerably from day to day; but even though a month from now exactly the same number were still on duty here, this would not necessarily mean that it was still made up of the same individuals, for the personnel is constantly changing. An officer on duty in Washington to-day may to-morrow receive orders to proceed to Europe and his place here will be filled by another.

At the time the United States became involved in the war the number of commissioned officers in the Army, including the National Guard then in Federal service, was 9,524, while at the present time there is a total of approximately 128,000. In view of this tremendous increase it is but natural that the number of officers on duty in Washington should likewise have been greatly augmented. This increase in the commissioned strength of the Army had to be effected in the shortest possible time, and it is perfectly natural that some mistakes were made and commissions given in some cases to applicants who would not have received them had the time for determining their qualifications been more ample. As soon as an error of this sort becomes apparent, it is rectified, and whenever the department's attention is called to a specific case an investigation is immediately ordered. In line with this policy a considerable number of officers in the Medical Corps have recently been discharged from service, which accounts for the apparent discrepancy between the figures now furnished and those which I gave out about two months ago.

In conclusion, it is only just to those officers who are detailed to duty in Washington to state, in their behalf, that the assignment was not of their own choosing, and that there are few amongst them who would not welcome the receipt of orders transferring them to duty at the front. With the exception of those amongst them who hold commissions in the Medical and Dental Corps, they are not noncombatants, as seems to be generally believed, but will be called upon to perform regular duty with troops and will all, from time to time, as occasion arises, be ordered to the front.

Very respectfully,

H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I directed a question to the gentleman from Mississippi inquiring whether or not he was in favor of having boys who have just attained maturity called immediately into the service and permit those who are already in the draft, men of more mature years who have no obligations or dependents, who have no profession or trades, to avoid service for some time to come, while the young man of 21 would be immediately pressed into service and the opportunity denied him of continuing his education, developing a profession, or learning a trade.

Had he answered my interrogatory I would not have inflicted myself upon this body, because of the limited time, and I want the chairman of the committee to know that I am grateful for the opportunity given me to say a few words.

The military authorities are willing, if this body so directs, that they call all who are in class 1 before mustering into service these young men who have attained the age of 21 years since May 18, 1917. Therefore, gentlemen, if we pass this amendment we will not in any way hamper or disturb the military authorities. Nothing in the world could induce me at this time, when the life of our Nation is in the balance, to handicap or embarrass the military authorities. I feel, like the gentleman from California, that if the time comes for the successful prosecution of this war if necessary we will call into service all boys from 18 and up, call on all Americans who are physically able to do battle to annihilate the Hun and to establish the principles of democracy, but until that time comes I favor this amendment and am unalterably opposed to taking the young man who has just reached 21 years of age, deprive him of higher education, a chance of advancement, and probably destroy his future career.

If this law is passed the young man will recognize that if the war continues he must eventually be called into service. He will have an opportunity during spare time to prepare himself in a military way, probably in his home town, by joining some military company that drill and prepare themselves in the evening and still the opportunity will be given him during the day to continue his studies.

It has been suggested that there should be no sentiment involved, which is true, because this is a practical question, a question of life and death, but it is absolutely impossible to eliminate sentiment from the hearts of the parents who are giving that which they hold most sacred in the world to their Government, and if, my friends, in this amendment we can alleviate the pain and anguish of the parents of these boys, help assuage their grief without working any hardship or disadvantage to the military authorities, I think their feelings should be taken into consideration.

I believe, and I think the majority of the Members of this House feel, that it is unjust to the young man of 21 to permit the military authorities at this time to call him into service until class 1 has been exhausted.

I believe, gentlemen, these young men should be given an opportunity to develop themselves physically and mentally until class 1 has been called into service.

I favor giving money, soldiers, ships, guns, shells, and whatever else necessary to win this war. I favor any just and honorable solution that will bring this conflict to a speedy and victorious termination, and I hold that the passage of this amendment will in no way retard our victory, which is inevitable.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, the announcement that was made the other day that there were 62,000 commissioned officers in the noncombatant service and a little over that number in the active fighting line was a startling statement to me. I had never taken notice of the requirements of this branch of the service. The discussion has created a great deal of interest that is manifesting itself in a great deal of correspondence. I have had letters from men in the camps which comment upon the situation. Interested in the statement, I sought an interview with one of the officers here in the city with whom I am very well acquainted, and who is identified with a certain activity in the War Department which enables him to speak with authority. I desired to know why we had so many of the "safety-first" men, as they were stigmatized, and how many could be called slackers. He told me last night that this was a great injustice to the men—that the great majority were here by order and would prefer service in the field. He informed me that in his own division he had offered as a sort of premium the promise that he would recommend the officers under his charge for service overseas, provided they reached a certain stage of efficiency. His experience with the men convinced him that such a prospect would insure a higher degree of service. He said that was the one persuasive, effective promise that he had made, which had resulted in greater efficiency. He also said the stigma of "swivel-chair" soldiers had produced such dissatisfaction among the men that a distinct demoralization had been observed throughout his division.

In another division there was a canvass made as to the number who would like to go overseas, and he told me that 100 per cent reported that they wanted over-sea service. It is significant that this canvass was made before the criticism was made here on the floor. This officer was broken in spirit in that he said that this criticism had so demoralized the morale of the men under him that they had come to a state of mind where they seemed to have no heart in the work here and demanded they be given a chance to go out into the service in the field away from Washington. He also made the statement that at least 50 per cent of those who are here, at least in his division, have been picked out of the camps and ordered here without their own consent. They had been selected on the basis of their record in the camps and were here under orders. They are fretful and insist upon getting from under this criticism which they declare is unjust to them, and they demand that in justice to themselves the criticism ought to be specific and not applied indiscriminately.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. My colleague on the committee, Mr. MORIN, has just inserted in the RECORD a letter from The Adjutant General showing that there are only 4,000 of those young officers here in Washington, while the general impression is that there are 15,000 or 20,000 of them.

Mr. FESS. I think that will correct an error also. Many will read the figures used in the criticism as confined to the men in Washington. I have no doubt there are men here in uniform with commissions who have no right to wear them if judged from their merit. No doubt undue influence has been brought to bear upon those in authority to secure preferment. Indeed, my informant assured me there were. He said the staff would be glad, if called upon, to name quietly persons who could be dispensed with, and intimated that congressional influence had been employed to place these men. That such is the case may easily be conceived, and criticism to that degree should be allowed, but it ought to be specific.

Mr. Speaker, just a half moment to say that I think this general criticism is unfair to these men, and there ought to be some caution about these charges. Under modern warfare the number back of the line is not far from that on the line. It seems incredible, but that is the statement of authorities based upon experience in Europe. Then again, these men especially selected for this noncombatant service, where selected by Army and Navy authorities without outside influence, were chosen because of their fitness as displayed in civil life. It is quite apparent that caution was and must be counseled. I agree that where it can be done all the clerical work should be done by those not in draft age. It should especially be guarded against allowing anyone of influence to secure a place for anyone who desires to shirk military duty. This should be the purpose of us all. But it is unfair to the great number of commissioned men here to place them in such a class. In behalf of that group I hope those who make these statements will note the terrible effect in demoralizing our ability to be 100 per cent effective.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, in the first place I hope that all of the committee amendments will be adopted. The committee considered the resolution very carefully, and was practically unanimous upon all the amendments that have been reported as committee amendments.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I have only five minutes, but I yield to the gentleman. I want to speak on the Hull amendment.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has just finished a statement in which I am interested and from which I infer that he is opposed to any interference with the officers who have been called from civil life and given commissions without any military training or experience. Does the gentleman from California think it is right that these men should be called from civil life and given these so-called "safety-zone" positions without any preparation whatever of a military character, and that men from the trenches who happen to meet them must salute them as their superiors? I am asking for information.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, that question will take me away from the discussion of this resolution which I have been very anxious to discuss. To answer it fully would take more time than I have at my disposal, but I will briefly answer the gentleman. I recognize the fact that the Army of the United States has been enormously expanded. I recognize the fact that experts are necessary in ordnance, in the Quartermaster's Department, in the Signal Corps, and in many branches of the Military Establishment, especially in the staff departments. Many of the men who fill the technical positions in the ordnance, for instance, are graduates of universities who are scientists; they are needed in the manufacture of powder, in making gas bombs, and in all of those activities in ordnance which are necessary for the winning of the war. At the very beginning many of these young men probably offered their services and showed their special aptitude in those lines. They were given commissions. That is how many of them were commissioned. Now, I will extend my remarks further, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. BARNHART. I hope the gentleman will correct the statement that these men are all college graduates.

Mr. KAHN. I did not intend to say they were all college graduates.

Mr. FARR. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KAHN. One moment. I want simply to say this about the pending matter. I do not think it is all important whether the Hull amendment be adopted or rejected. But I recognize the fact that we are in war; that we are in a desperate war and will need millions of men—perhaps many more millions than any of us feel at this time the country will be called upon to supply. Then why should we want to tie the hands of the War Department, which will have to furnish these armies? Why should we lay down to them a hard and fast rule under a law of Congress when in the emergencies that may arise during the continuation of the war the time may come when it will be advisable for the department to use its discretion and do that which is best for the country? That is why I shall not vote for the Hull amendment.

A great deal has been said here about young men 21 years of age. Do you not recognize the fact that in our Army to-day we probably have hundreds of thousands of young men who volunteered at 18 years of age? They are on the other side now, fighting for their country. Do you want to pull them out of the Army because they volunteered? According to the logic of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] and some of the other gentlemen who have spoken for the Hull amendment, the War Department should begin the draft first with those who are 31, then those who are 30, then those who are 29, and so on, until they come to the youngest on the list—those who are 21. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, just a few moments, and then I shall ask for a vote on this resolution. The proposition presented by the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] I shall vote against for the simple reason, as given by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], that it is a matter that should be left to regulation rather than to strict statutory law. I am informed by some members of the Provost Marshal General's Office that the amendment as offered by the gentleman from Iowa will be carried into effect by the War Department unless something happens that will necessitate a change in their minds. I think, therefore, this should be a matter that should be left to regulation rather than to the strict language of a statutory enactment. Now, one other question, Mr. Speaker, and I shall ask for a vote. Nothing has been said in this debate about the action of the committee in striking out the Senate amendment exempting theological and medical students. The committee thought that in registering young men coming of age that there ought to be no exemption. The committee was practically unanimous upon that proposition. It was urged that if we adopt the action of the Military Committee of the House that we will interfere with the education of young men studying for the ministry and the practice of medicine. That same proposition, so far as medical students are concerned, was presented when the original draft law was up last year, and both houses finally agreed to strike out the exemption in behalf of medical students. The President has absolute power as Commander in Chief of the Army to take care of medical students and theological students if this draft should so interfere with them as to affect the number of young men in those two professions.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I would like to finish this.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman explain why he omitted from this bill the exemption of medical students and students of divinity, whereas in section 4 of the draft law it says there shall be an exception in their favor. Now the gentleman's committee has stricken out that exception in this bill. Will the gentleman explain that?

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman from Alabama will permit, I can explain that. The exemptions are of those students who are already in the colleges, but this would exempt those who have gone into colleges since the last draft.

Mr. ROBBINS. Proposes to exempt them?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why are they not entitled to exemption as much as the others?

Mr. DENT. I did not yield for any colloquy. The gentleman from California has exactly explained the matter. The language of section 1 to which attention is called applies to the law as it was passed May 18, and, as the gentleman from California says, the other would extend the provisions of that law to the young men who have become 21 years of age since the 5th day of last June. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say one further thing upon this proposition, that if you leave the bill as it comes from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, I repeat, the President of the United States can take care of the situation just as he did with the medical students under the present law. Besides that, under this law it is not intended and is not contemplated, as some gentlemen fear, that amendment will materially interfere with these students. It is not contemplated that every young man who is preparing for the ministry or for the medical profession shall be taken by the draft. There will be many of them who will not be taken I think we ought to have a uniform law without any exemptions whatever and leave it to the Commander in Chief of the Army to take care of whatever situation that may arise. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on page 3, on the proviso in reference to the two classes——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any other committee amendment?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I think in the ordinary procedure the amendments are voted on seriatim as they occur in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is true, but it occurred to the Chair there would be no objection to voting on those amendments en bloc on which a separate vote is not demanded.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think that is contemplated by the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not know of any rule prohibiting the adoption of amendments by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. I think the rule provides in the Committee of the Whole the amendments shall be voted on as they occur in the bill. This is not in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. Providing you put the question and the vote should be negative would there be any further vote on any other separate amendment, or all be defeated?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All defeated.

Mr. LITTLE. Then I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas objects, and the Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment, page 1, line 3, after the word "That," insert the words "during the present emergency."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "States," strike out the word "or" and insert "and all male persons."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "as," strike out the words "in said proclamation may be exempted from registration," and insert in lieu thereof "are exempt from registration under the act of May 18, 1917, and any act or acts amendatory thereof."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the word "of," strike out the word "the" and insert in lieu thereof the word "said."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 21, after the words "United States," strike out the word "or" and insert "and all male persons."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 25, after the word "as," strike out the words "in the proclamation by the President stating the time and place of such registration may be exempted from registration," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "are exempt from registration under the act of May 18, 1917, and any act or acts amendatory thereof."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 3, line 7, after the word "act," strike out the proviso down to and including the word "President," in line 19.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, that is not the proper way to report that amendment.

The Clerk reported the amendment, as follows:

Strike out the proviso, as follows:

"Provided, That students who are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and students who are preparing for the practice of medicine and surgery in recognized medical schools, at the time of the approval of this act shall be exempt from the selective draft prescribed in the act of May 18, 1917; and that students entering such theological or divinity schools after the approval of this act and during the continuance of the war, and who would be subject to any future registration as provided for in this act, may upon the recommendation or request of the president or dean of such school be exempt from the selective draft by order of the President."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I rise to ask for a division of the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The amendment relates to two classes of students, one theological students and the other medical students. The suggestion I make is that in line 9 the amendment be voted on with these words out:

And students who are preparing for the practice of medicine and surgery in recognized medical schools.

Now, I ask for a vote on the amendment with that language out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, if the question is going to be divided, I ask unanimous consent that the vote first be taken on that clause of the amendment exempting medical students.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the vote first be taken on the provision exempting medical students.

Mr. FESS. Any Member can demand a division, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Any Member can demand a division. The Chair was simply putting the request of the gentleman from Alabama for unanimous consent that the vote first be taken on striking out the provision excepting medical students. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will that prevent us from having a separate vote on the exclusion of students of divinity?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the portion of the amendment striking students of medical schools out of the committee amendment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The effect of that will be, if the motion prevails, to exempt medical students?

Mr. GORDON. No; just the opposite.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Just the reverse. The Clerk will report the amendment as it would exist in case the request of the gentleman from Alabama is adhered to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 7, after the word "act," strike out the following:

"Provided, That students who are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools at the time of the approval of this act shall be exempt from the selective draft prescribed in the act of May 18, 1917; and that students entering such theological or divinity schools after the approval of this act and during the continuance of the war, and who would be subject to any future registration as provided for in this act, may, upon the recommendation or request of the president or dean of such school, be exempt from the selective draft by order of the President."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] wanted a vote first on the language with medical students left in.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He was reporting it as it would read with medical students stricken out.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought he was reporting it as it was up to that point.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKENZIE. A vote "aye" on this proposition as now reported by the Clerk means to sustain the action of the Committee on Military Affairs, does it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the way the Chair understands it.

Mr. FESS. I think there is confusion here. If we divide the amendment and vote separately, first on one part of the division and secondly on the other part, the regular procedure would be to vote down the part we want to retain?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama has got unanimous consent to take up the part relating to medical students first. Now will the gentleman from Alabama make a motion so that the Chair may place it before the House as he understands it?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask that the language that is to be stricken out be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair just had the Clerk read the amendment with the language left out, as he understood it. Without objection, the language to be stricken out will now be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 9, after the word "schools," strike out the following: "and students who are preparing for the practice of medicine and surgery in recognized medical schools."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Do I understand that the language just read by the Clerk—that is, "students who are preparing for the practice of medicine and surgery in recognized medical schools"—has been stricken out?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has been stricken out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And a "yea" vote now would be to retain the rest of it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No. Having already stricken out the medical students, now the question is whether you would strike out the divinity students. The question is now on the amendment to strike out the language indicated.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 101, noes 2.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently a quorum is not present. The Clerk will call the roll. The Doorkeeper will close the doors.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is an automatic call. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the amendment striking out this language will answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 262, nays 29, answered "present" 3, not voting 136, as follows:

So the amendment to strike out was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina with Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi with Mr. DENISON.

Mr. MARTIN with Mr. COOPER of Ohio.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY with Mr. ELSTON.

Mr. SUMNERS with Mr. HUSTED.

Mr. VENABLE with Mr. HICKS.

Mr. BRODBECK with Mr. MEEKER.

Mr. CROSSER with Mr. SWITZER.

Mr. STEELE with Mr. STEENERSON.
Mr. STERLING of Pennsylvania with Mr. WINSLOW.
Mr. WELLING with Mr. VOIGT.
Mr. WRIGHT with Mr. WILSON of Illinois.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I have a pair with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT]. I voted "yea." If he were present, I believe he would vote the same way, so I will let my vote stand.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL of Iowa: Page 2, line 16, after the word "act," insert the following:

"Provided, That those persons registered under the provisions of this act shall be placed at the bottom of the list of those liable for military service in the several classes to which they are assigned, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. Does that refer to the boys now becoming 21?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GORDON. It does, though.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment speaks for itself. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. FIELDS) there were—ayes 119, noes 81.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

By unanimous consent, leave was given to Mr. FIELDS, Mr. DARROW, Mr. FESS, and Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LEHLBACH, for three days, to participate in the liberty-loan campaign;

To Mr. SIEGEL, for five days, on account of liberty-loan speeches he is to make;

To Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana, indefinitely, on account of important business; and

To Mr. SHOUSE, for 10 days, on account of illness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TO-MORROW.

Mr. FOSTER. If the House will indulge me for a moment, I desire to say that it is now nearly 5 o'clock, and it seems rather late to go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the mining bill. I want to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I shall call it up and pass it, if possible, to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. I infer from the gentleman's statement that the report we have seen in the press that the House will adjourn to-morrow is a mistake.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know anything about that. I have not had any request of that kind.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is not my intention to move an adjournment of the House to-morrow, but to stay here and do business. [Applause.] I do not think that the parade of the House or the Senate in this demonstration to-morrow would add 10 cents to the sale of the bonds. I think we ought to stay here and work. [Applause.]

ACCOUNTS AND EXPENDITURES OF THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of H. Res. 307, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of H. Res. 307, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Rules. Is there objection?

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have any objection to that motion. This bill was first referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department, which clearly had no jurisdiction of it, as determined by the House this morning. The House sent the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

I doubt somewhat the propriety of a committee passing upon a resolution which confers special powers and privileges on that committee itself. I doubt, too, whether under parliamentary law this resolution ought to go to the Post Office Committee. For that reason, and for the further reason that it is not strictly a legislative resolution, but one that determines power over the investigation by the House, I think it ought to go to the Committee on Rules. I am not speaking for the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, because the committee has had no meeting; but expressing my own views, as chairman of that committee, I see no reason why, properly, this resolution should not go to the Committee on Rules rather than to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9832. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Seward, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $25,000 for the purpose of constructing dikes, flumes, and other works to confine the waters of Lowell Creek for the protection of said town.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, April 26, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MANSFIELD, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4246) to increase the salary of the United States district attorney for the district of Connecticut, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 513), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PADGETT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9747) to provide temporary increased rank for officers of the United States Coast Guard while operating as a part of the Navy during the period of the present war, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 514), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. WALTON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 918) for the relief of William E. Johnson, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 516), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4239) for the relief of Dora Gaines Delano, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 517), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 11691) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon at Marshfield, in the State of Oregon; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SISSON: A bill (H. R. 11692) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

By Mr. WELLING: A bill (H. R. 11693) for the relief of purchasers from the State of Utah of lands in sections 2, 16, 32, and 36 in said State; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11694) to amend the public-building act approved March 4, 1913; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. LANGLEY: Resolution (H. Res. 323) increasing the compensation of the majority and minority messengers in charge of telephones; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. SWIFT: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of New York, favoring the entrance of the United States into a league of nations for the preservation of peace; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of New York, favoring the entrance of the United States into a league of nations to safeguard peace after the termination of the present war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DOOLING: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of New York, favoring a league of nations to safeguard peace after the termination of the present war; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 11695) to create a rural credits society and general insurance league to facilitate the increase in farm production, to create two fiscal and financial agents for the Government of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. HUTCHINSON: Resolution (H. Res. 324) to increase the salaries of the two chief pages of the House of Representatives; to the Committee on Accounts.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CANTRILL: A bill (H. R. 11696) granting an increase of pension to Sallie Hager; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLASSON: A bill (H. R. 11697) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Martell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 11698) granting pension to Elizabeth Freeman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 11699) granting an increase of pension to James Norris; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11700) granting an increase of pension to Louis G. Murray; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FORDNEY: A bill (H. R. 11701) granting an increase of pension to Alonzo Matteson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 26, 1918.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 24, 1918.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 9832) to authorize the incorporated town of Seward, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $25,000 for the purpose of constructing dikes, flumes, and other works to confine the waters of Lowell Creek for the protection of said town, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Trades Assembly of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Buildings' Exchange of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the adoption of a proposed amendment to the naval appropriation bill penalizing the granting of bonuses and premiums for efficiency of employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Henry Morton Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Minnesota, of St. Charles, Minn., praying for an increase in the pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented resolutions adopted by sundry citizens of the fifth congressional district of Michigan, and resolutions adopted by sundry citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., favoring an investigation by Congress into the arrest of suffragists who picketed at the White House and also of treatment accorded the several suffragists who were detained at Occoquan, Va., which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Association of Commerce of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Clio, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the running of railroad tracks directly opposite the Lucy Webb Hayes National Training School and the Sibley Memorial Hospital, Washington, D. C., which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Augusta, Me., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Waldoboro, Me., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 168) to grant an honorable discharge to John W. Jester; and

A bill (S. 171) for the relief of Thomas W. Miller.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3124) for the relief of Francis M. Atherton, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 409) thereon.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted a report (No. 410) accompanied by a bill (S. 4451) to provide for allowances for and minimum pay of Army field clerks, to provide for increased pay to Army field clerks for service beyond the continental limits of the United States, and to provide quarters or commutation thereof to Army field clerks in certain cases.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 4446) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Lauman (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4447) granting an increase of pension to Daniel M. Crockett (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4448) granting an increase of pension to Francis A. Strout (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4449) granting an increase of pension to Hosea Butterfield (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4450) granting an increase of pension to Sewall W. Hewett (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

UNITED STATES BOY SCOUTS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have received a number of letters from different parts of the United States in relation to the Boy Scouts of America. I have a letter from Hughes, Rounds, Schurman & Dwight, of New York, dated April 18, 1918, upon this subject. I have been requested to have it printed in the RECORD, so that it may be a notice to the people of the United States as to what is taking place in reference to an organization known in the United States as the United States Boy Scouts, giving an account of the small group of men who head the organization which many people in the United States have mistaken to be the Boy Scouts of America. I will not take the time of the Senate to read it, but ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, April 18, 1918.

HON. REED SMOOT,
Washington, D. C.

BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA V. UNITED STATES BOY SCOUTS.

DEAR SIR: For some time a small group of men, headed by a jeweler and repairman known as L. W. Amerman, of 7 Maiden Lane, New York City, and John D. Gluck, a professional charity solicitor, of 28 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City, has been endeavoring to trade upon the good name and standing of the Boy Scouts of America. They obtained control of a paper organization known as the United States Boy Scouts or as the Seventh Regiment United States Boy Scouts, and have been leading people to think that they were interested in the Boy Scouts of America, the well-known Boy Scout organization. They have no connection whatever with the Boy Scouts of America, and there is no such organization known as the Seventh Regiment United States Boy Scouts in the true Boy Scout organization.

As attorneys for the Boy Scouts of America, as well as from a desire to protect an organization of which we have the highest opinion, and which we know is conducting war work second to none, we desire to warn you against sending any communication or having anything to do with Gluck and Amerman until you have satisfied yourself thoroughly as to the facts and as to what use will be made of a letter from you by them. Our investigations show it to be a fact that in the past Gluck and Amerman have made use of the names of prominent men to obtain contributions for themselves by misleading these men to believe they were supporting the Boy Scouts of America.

It is not only unfortunate but it is unpatriotic for the group of men headed by Gluck and Amerman to make the efforts they have been making in the last two weeks to bring themselves in the public eye. Their efforts at any other time would be of little or no importance and would not affect the Boy Scouts of America, but just at this time the Boy Scouts of America are ready to begin a nation-wide campaign in behalf of the third liberty loan. In the second campaign the Boy Scouts of America obtained over 533,000 subscriptions, amounting to over $102,000,000, and even greater success is anticipated in view of the careful plans that have been made for the third campaign in conjunction with the Treasury Department.

The practical results of the efforts of Gluck and Amerman can be no other than to interfere with the success of the third liberty loan and to cause confusion and misunderstanding.

Very truly, yours,

HUGHES, ROUNDS, SCHURMAN & DWIGHT.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate the executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Norris	Smoot
Baird	Henderson	Nugent	Sutherland
Bankhead	Hollis	Overman	Thomas
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Thompson
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Tillman
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Townsend
Culberson	Kellogg	Pomerene	Trammell
Cummins	Kirby	Ransdell	Underwood
Dillingham	Knox	Reed	Vardaman
Fall	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Fernald	Lodge	Shafroth	Walsh
Fletcher	McKellar	Sheppard	Warren
Frelinghuysen	McLean	Sherman	Williams
Gallinger	McNary	Shields	Wolcott
Gronna	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Hale	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Harding	New	Smith, S. C.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is necessarily absent owing to illness.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. PITTMAN] in the liberty-loan campaign. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON], now engaged in the liberty-loan campaign.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is detained on official business and that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily detained on important public business.

Mr. BECKHAM. I announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in connection with what was said yesterday by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] on the amendment of the Senator from New York, I think we ought to pause for just a moment to consider what the act the Senator from North Carolina referred to contains.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. I have an intimation from the Senator from North Carolina that he is disposed to accept the amendment of the Senator from New York so far as he can do it.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire, notwithstanding that fact, to submit a few observations, and the Senator from North Carolina will have an opportunity to accept it as soon as I conclude.

The act referred to by the Senator from North Carolina yesterday, in which he thought power was already lodged, is "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes."

In an interruption yesterday I called attention to the fact that at the time this act was passed a great deal of stress was laid in the newspaper dispatches upon the importance of the act, in reality threatening Senators if they interposed any objection to the passage of that bill. The articles appeared, as I remember it, the day the bill was reported to the Senate from the Military Affairs Committee, and carried in Associated Press dispatches were published all over the United States, mentioning several Senators by name and intimating that they were opposed to the bill and were going to obstruct its passage. There was, however, no objection from any source to the passage of the bill. Every Senator who said anything about it expressed himself in favor of its passage, and it was passed unanimously without a roll-call vote. The only objection, as I remember it, that was made was an amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the bill, and upon that there was a roll-call vote. The bill provided in section 3 as follows:

That to provide the additional enlisted men required by this act, the President is authorized to raise and maintain, by voluntary enlistment or by draft, such number of enlisted men—

And so forth.

The Senator from Georgia made a motion to strike out the words "or by draft," and in the argument which took place on that amendment it developed that those who favored the amendment believed that there ought to be no authority to draft men for the air service, because of the peculiar fitness a man must possess to go into that service, and that it should be done by enlistment. On the other side it was argued by the chairman o the committee that it was not intended to draft anybody, and he realized that it was not a practical proposition to draft men for the aircraft service. The amendment was defeated, and the bill was passed without amendment.

That bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs on the 17th day of July, and it was passed through the Senate without amendment on the 18th day of July. You must remember that at the time we had the food-control bill before the Senate as the unfinished business. I think it was the food-control bill. It was some bill anyway, so that very little time was devoted to this bill. Not more than an hour or two of debate took place on it. So the bill passed the Senate, and, having passed the House July 14, it was approved by the President on the 24th day of the same month, and has been a law ever since.

Because I intend to vote against the pending Overman bill if it is not amended by eliminating one or two of the bureaus of the Government, I think I ought to state if the so-called Overman bill is amended so that a few exceptions can be made of bureaus that, in my judgment, have nothing to do with the carrying on of the war and that ought not to be interfered with and the power ought not to be given to any official to interfere with them—with those amendments, I expect to vote for the bill.

But in connection with that, as has been developed in this debate, when you are asked to specify, as I think ought to be specified in the bill to be fair with everybody, just what powers are wanted, it is found difficult to specify them, because it is found that the authority in the President already exists. For that reason I want to call attention to this aircraft law, which passed the Senate without opposition and which has been on the statute books since the 24th day of July and under which all the Government activities in regard to the Aircraft Board and aircraft construction have taken place.

I believe it will be found that the existing law contains all the powers which the Wadsworth amendment to the Overman bill would give the President, although I have no objection to the Wadsworth amendment. The President ought to have the power; but for fear that some one may say that this is one of the powers which ought to be given to the President, I want to read from the law the power the President now possesses over the Aircraft Board and that he has possessed ever since the 24th day of last July. Section 2, in part, says:

That to provide the additional commissioned personnel required by this act the President is authorized to promote, appoint, detail, or attach as temporary officers in the Signal Corps, including the Aviation Section thereof, officers of the Regular Army, National Army, or National Guard, or the Officers' Reserve Corps, or to appoint temporarily enlisted men of the Regular Army, enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, or persons from civil life.

I take it that he can appoint from all classes of people. There are practically no exceptions.

The bill passed at that time as an administration measure, prepared, as I understand it, by the administration, contained 12 pages and a number of sections. A great many of the powers given to the President by that act are specified in section 9, and I want to read section 9 of the law:

SEC. 9. That during the existing emergency authority is hereby given to the President, through the War Department, for the purchase, manufacture, maintenance, repair, and operation of airships and other aerial machines, including instruments and appliances of every sort and description necessary for the operation, construction, or equipment of all types of aircraft, including guns, armament, ammunition, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith; and all necessary buildings for equipment and personnel in the Aviation Section and for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation, through the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, of all motor-propelled passenger and equipment carrying vehicles which may be necessary for the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps.

And during the existing emergency authority is hereby further given for the establishment, equipment, maintenance, and operation of aviation stations, including (a) the acquisition of land, or any interest in land, with any buildings and improvements thereon, by purchase, lease, donation, condemnation, or otherwise: Provided, That by order of the President any unappropriated or reserved public lands may be reserved from entry, designated, and used for such aviation stations; (b) the improvement of such land by clearing, grading, draining, seeding, and otherwise making the same suitable for the purpose intended; (c) the construction, maintenance, and repair of permanent or temporary barracks, quarters, hospitals, mess houses, administration, instructional and recreational buildings, hangars, magazines, storehouses, sheds, shops, garages, boathouses, docks, radio stations, laboratories, observation stations, and all other buildings and structures necessary or advisable; (d) procuring and introducing water, electric light and power, telephones, telegraph, and sewerage to aviation stations and buildings and structures thereon by the extension of existing systems or the creation of new systems and their maintenance, operation and repair, installation of plumbing, electric fixtures and telephones, fire apparatus and fire-alarm systems and the maintenance, operation, and repair of all such systems, fixtures, and apparatus; (e) construction and repair of roads, walks, sea walls, breakwaters, bridges and wharves, dredging, filling, and otherwise improving land and water sites; (f) purchase of stoves and other cooking and heating apparatus, kitchen and tableware, and furniture and equipment for kitchens, mess halls, offices, quarters, barracks, hospitals, and other buildings, screens, lockers, refrigerators, and all other necessary equipment; (g) purchase of gasoline, oil, fuel, and all supplies of every kind and character necessary or advisable for maintenance and operation of aviation stations, including electric light and power, telephones, water supply and sewerage service; (h) purchase and manufacture and installation of all kinds of machinery, tools, material, supplies, and equipment for construction, maintenance, and repair of aircraft, buildings, and improvements at aviation stations, or property or appliances used in connection with aviation.

And also for the purchase or manufacture and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes.

And also for the actual and necessary expenses of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of the Army and authorized agents sent on special duty at home and abroad for aviation purposes, including observation and investigation of foreign military operations and organization, manufacture of aircraft, and engines, also special courses in foreign aviation schools and manufacturing establishments, to be paid upon certificates of the Secretary of War certifying that the expenditures were necessary for military purposes.

And also for vocational training, including employment of necessary civilian instructors in important trades related to aviation, purchase of tools, equipment, materials, and machines required for such training, purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, periodicals and magazines, and instruments and material for theoretical and practical instruction at aviation schools and stations, and all other means to carry out the provisions of section 27 of the act approved June 3, 1916, authorizing, in addition to the military training of soldiers while in active service, means for securing educational and vocational training of a character to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations.

And also to pay and otherwise provide for such officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps and such enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps as may be called into active service and such enlisted men as may be enlisted in the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps under the provisions of section 2 of the act to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, approved May 18, 1917, or any subsequent act temporarily increasing the commissioned or enlisted personnel of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps and such civilian employees as may be necessary, for the payment of their traveling and other necessary expenses when not traveling with troops: Provided, That hereafter all reserve officers and enlisted men of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps shall be paid by Quartermaster Corps disbursing officers from funds transferred to their credit from Signal Corps appropriations.

And also for the payment of all expenses in connection with the development of suitable types of aviation engines, airplanes, and other aircraft appurtenances, including the cost of sample engines, airplanes, and appurtenances, cost of any patents and other rights therein, and costs of investigation, experimentation, and research in respect thereto.

And also for the payment of all expenses in connection with the creation, expansion, acquisition, and development of plants, factories, and establishments for the manufacture of airplanes, aircraft, engines, and appurtenances, including provision for the purchase or lease of land with the buildings thereon, construction of permanent or temporary buildings for all purposes, purchase of machinery, tools, and employment of operatives, together with all administrative expenses necessary, the purchase and supply of raw and semifinished materials and of fuel and all other things necessary for creating and extending the production of airplanes, aircraft, engines, and all appurtenances.

And also for creating, maintaining, and operating at technical schools and colleges courses of instruction for aviation students, including cost of instruction, equipment, and supplies necessary for instruction and subsistence of students while receiving such instruction.

Provided, That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, motor-propelled vehicles, airplanes, engines, parts thereof, and appurtenances may be exchanged in part payment for new equipment of the same or similar character to be used for the same purpose as those proposed to be exchanged.

Provided further, That during the present emergency, officers and enlisted men of foreign armies attached to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps as instructors or inspectors when traveling in the United States on official business pertaining to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps shall be authorized, from funds appropriated by this act, the same mileage and transportation allowances as are authorized for officers or enlisted men of the Regular Army.

Then follows the section which appropriates the money for carrying out the various objects that are enumerated, the sum being $640,000,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Did the Senator from Nebraska say that something was left out of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not notice that anything was left out. In fact, I can not think of anything more that could be put into the bill. It seems to me that, in so far as the aviation proposition is concerned, the President, when he asked for the passage of that bill, put into it everything that he could think of, and we gave him everything we could think of in the way of power to carry it out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have no right to speak further, having spoken on yesterday for about two minutes. I said to the Senator from New York that I would examine the bill which has been read by the Senator from Nebraska and see whether the authority provided for is not already granted in what is known as the Overman bill. I think it is, except the amendment goes further than the Overman bill in that it authorizes the President to create an agency. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I accept the amendment and ask the Senate to adopt it. I think, however, the Senator from New York modified his amendment in one respect yesterday afternoon, as it now differs from the amendment which I have on my desk. I will ask the Senator if the amendment as now before the Senate does not differ somewhat from the shape in which it was previously offered? I ask that the amendment be read, as that will be the best way to ascertain its present form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from New York will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the President is further authorized to establish an executive agency which may exercise such jurisdiction and control over the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment as in his judgment may be advantageous; and, further, to transfer to such agency, for its use, all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been reading the amendment, and I am attracted by the concluding sentence:

And, further, to transfer to such agency, for its use, all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

I will ask the Senator from New York if there is any money remaining of the large appropriation that has been heretofore made? I have been told that the $640,000,000—I believe that is the figure—that we appropriated has been exhausted, and that there is a deficit of a couple of hundred million dollars.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, let me say that my recollection of the testimony before the Military Affairs Committee is that more than $640,000,000 have been obligated by outstanding contracts, but the fulfillment of those contracts is so very much behind time that actually something less than $300,000,000, according to my recollection, has been expended. So, in that sense, there is an unexpended balance, but every penny of the appropriation is obligated. This amendment—the language of which was very hastily drawn and probably somewhat crude—would simply permit the President to transfer any or all of that money which is now obligated, but as yet unexpended, from the Treasury to an executive agency which he might name, and have him expend it.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, I assume, means that the money being obligated and the contracts having been made——

Mr. WADSWORTH. The contracts have been made.

Mr. GALLINGER. Those contracts, I suppose, could not well be disturbed under the terms of this amendment, could they?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think not. The paymaster would merely be a different person.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is all. I simply desired to be informed on that point, because I had been told by various persons who seemed to think, at least, that they had accurate information that the appropriation had been exhausted, and that the board was now calling for more money; but there will be no money to transfer, and doubtless these contracts will remain.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not hear the Senator, and, if he will please do so, I should like for him to speak louder.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will repeat. I was saying that I had been told by various persons that the large appropriation heretofore made had been exhausted, and I assume it is, in a business sense at least, because contracts have been made that will take all of the money appropriated, and a still further amount will be asked for. So there will be no money to be transferred; the contracts will remain in force, I take it, and this new organization, if it does very much business, will have to come to Congress to get more money, which doubtless we shall have to appropriate. I shall, however, vote for the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New York if he is quite sure that the statement he has made in relation to the expenditure of the money appropriated for the building of airplanes is correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I base the statement, Mr. President, on the testimony of Col. Deeds, made before the Committee on Military Affairs. That very point was brought up, but it was in secret session, and I do not now remember whether a record was kept of that testimony. Perhaps the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] may remember.

Mr. THOMAS. I think not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But, in any event, I think it was the Senator from Colorado who brought up that point and questioned Col. Deeds as to the financial status, as it were, and we were informed, according to the best of my recollection, that more than $640,000,000 had been obligated, but that the actual expenditures to date were something less than $300,000,000. Fifty-odd million dollars of that was for the building of aviation training camps.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason I asked the question was that there has been an estimate submitted by the Treasury Department for $400,000,000 additional for the building of airplanes, and it was stated to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that that sum should be appropriated immediately. The estimate was submitted to the committee after the last urgent deficiency appropriation bill had been considered and reported to the Senate; but I have been informed, Mr. President, the statement was made that not only had they spent the $640,000,000 but that there was a deficit of $200,000,000 at the time the estimate was submitted, and that they wanted $200,000,000 more; or, in other words, $400,000,000, as provided for in the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not surprised that the Senator is somewhat mystified at the state of affairs, because it is well known that we have all been mystified to a certain extent in connection with the aircraft program. On September 13 last the Secretary of War, in a public announcement through the Official Bulletin, stated that the Liberty motor had had its final test; five or six weeks later it was announced through the Official Bulletin that already, in October, 1917, all types of battle airplanes, fighting machines, and fast scout machines were in process of manufacture; and on February 20, 1918, there was published an official statement to the effect that we were five months ahead of our aviation program, so that the Senator from Utah is not alone in his endeavor to find out the truth.

Mr. SMOOT. If the statement made by the Senator from New York be correct, of course the provisions of the amendment should remain as they are, and I think, perhaps, Mr. President, the words relating to the availability of the money heretofore appropriated ought to remain in the amendment, at any rate, because if there is no money available, of course it can not be transferred.

But I rose, Mr. President, to make the statement that has been so generally made, outside of this Chamber, at least, that not only has the $640,000,000 been expended, but there is a deficit of $200,000,000, and I know that that amount was asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury, and it was desired to include it in the last urgent deficiency appropriation bill because of the fact that it was a deficit.

I will say, Mr. President, that I am not positive as to whether or not the statement in regard to the expenditure of the $640,000,000 is correct, but I am positive as to the request that was made and as to the estimate that was submitted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit, I think that the obligations which have been assumed by the Aviation Section transcend the appropriation of $640,000,000 very materially, and doubtless the request of the Secretary was made because of the fact that these obligations must be met, and can only be met, by a deficiency or other appropriation in addition to that of last year.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, then it should not be classed as a deficiency, because wherever there is a deficiency and an appropriation is made to cover it, it is understood that the money has actually been paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and the appropriation is made to cover the amount so paid from the Treasury.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no personal knowledge of the fact I am stating, but, unless that be the condition, I am unable to account for the correctness of the statement of Col. Deeds, which, I think, was made upon a very intimate knowledge of the actual conditions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just a word. The observations I made were for the purpose of developing the very thing that has been discussed. The Committee on Appropriations was asked to give an additional appropriation of $400,000,000 for aircraft production, and unquestionably that appropriation will have to be made; there is no doubt in the world about that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I had not expected to discuss this bill, but was going to content myself, as I have usually done in these unusual cases, by voting for the measure, with the hope that there was something in it at least that would result in benefit to war preparation. I knew there was no new law necessary in order to give the President power to do all the things which the advocates of this bill openly claim ought to be done. I have felt, and still feel, that we have already granted all the power that could possibly be used by the President in the conduct of the war.

I have known that from the beginning of the war we have been imposing upon various bills amendments which had no place there of right, but which were put upon them because there was an opportunity to do so in the hysterical condition in which the Congress and the country found themselves, and because somebody unknown to Congress wanted the provisions. I have known that many measures called "war emergency bills" have been introduced whose parentage was at the White House, or at least in the administration, and they were urged because it was stated they were absolutely important to the successful conduct of the war and that they should be passed immediately, although Congress was not permitted to know the reasons. The proponents of the pending bill admit that conditions in the executive and administrative branches of the Government are bad, that preparedness has been seriously delayed, and that practically all of the war divisions have fallen short of what the country needs and of what it had a right to demand.

One of the causes of this failure, it is claimed, is the confusion and duplication of work in various offices. The fact is, and the country ought to know it, that all of this confusion and duplication are in departments operated by men selected by the President—men appointed by him and subject at all times to his orders.

I do not know of a single department which has been justly criticized for failure that has not been in charge of men appointed by the President; and the President, who has the power to appoint, has the power to remove. There is not a single one of these officers who can not be removed by the order of the President the same as he was placed there by the President. He requires no law to discharge the incompetent, none to engage the competent. But I have realized that the President has not coordinated these departments. He has not seen fit to remove unfit men from office. He has not seen fit—not until very recently, at least—to select big men from the country to take charge of the Nation's great emergency business; and I have been willing to do anything to induce action in this regard by the President.

It is claimed now that if this bill is passed the President will do the things which he has claimed ought to have been done and which the proponents of the measure believe should be done, and therefore I have felt that possibly it was wise to give him this proposed law, even though it contained powers which are unconnected with the war and which no man ought to have in a Republic, although I believe he would not exercise those powers, and I want something done more than is being done by the United States to win the war. But the remarks on yesterday of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who has charge of this bill, gave me a new insight into the measure which I had not had before. He insists now that the President ought not to be compelled to come to Congress every time he wants anything; that he has been coming to Congress in the past with these emergency measures, and now it is found that they were mistakes, and he should be given authority to undo them without being subject to the annoyance and delay of coming to Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President. The Senator, I know, does not intend to misrepresent me. I said that by reason of the condition of the laws we had had to pass 8 or 10 bills, and I illustrated it by saying that there is one here now; that the President, under the authority of my bill, could have made the transfer proposed in that bill without being compelled to come to Congress, but that by reason of the limitations of the statutes he had to come here and ask for these bills, to which nobody objected, and it took time to pass them. I think there were 8 bills or 10 bills that lay here in Congress for some time because of the delays in the committees, and so forth, whereas if the President had had the power to transfer in those cases, as this bill provides, he would not have had to come to Congress.

I illustrated my meaning by a bill I had in my pocket that had been before the committee asking simply to allow Gen. Crowder, the Judge Advocate General, to transfer some engineers from the Quartermaster Department to his department for the purpose of construction. He told us that he had to have those people, but the law so limited him that he could not make the transfer, whereas if he had had the power which the pending bill confers he could have made the transfer. I illustrated my point by that bill. While nobody objected to it, it lay in the committee a long time, and eventually came to the Senate and was placed on the calendar, and was finally passed by the Senate, and now it sleeps in the House, whereas he needed those men at once.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I understood the Senator very well, and to be sure about it I went over his printed remarks this morning, in order that I might not misunderstand the situation. The Senator also cited at the same time the fact that we had already passed two bills with reference to aviation, and stated that they were hurriedly passed, and intimated that they were mistakes. It is a fact that many bills have been passed under the whip of emergency, really at the command of the President, and now it is proposed to pass a law that will enable those laws to be diverted from the purpose for which they were enacted, or nullified if the President so desires.

Mr. President, I know of no Executive action necessary to the successful prosecution of the war that has been delayed by the failure of Congress to appropriate money or enact necessary legislation. Immature and unwise laws have been enacted by Executive order and under the overworked excuse, "Necessary to win the war." These laws have had a stated object. Now, it is proposed to change these laws by Executive decree, and to that end this bill is presented. I had supposed that its object was to give the President power to coordinate the duties and functions of the men he had appointed, but which he had discovered were not working well where he had placed them. After the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate had discovered the woeful lack of coordination and achievement on the part of the men that the President had placed in control of war matters and had recommended reorganization, the President became a convert to the idea, but he insisted it must be his idea. He, however, became an advocate of coordination, and hence this bill. But how inconsistent he is. This bill is to correct duplication of work, and yet another measure is now before the Senate and being urged by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] as the most important war measure that has come before Congress, namely, the housing bill, so called. That bill, instead of coordinating, is separating the functions of government.

For instance, we passed not a great while ago an emergency bill appropriating $50,000,000 for building houses to expedite shipbuilding. It was claimed by those who advocated the bill that it was absolutely essential that it be passed at once, and it was passed immediately. Now it appears that none of that money has been expended. That emergency legislation, passed months ago, is still unused, although the emergency still exists; and we learn indirectly through the discussion on the bill that the cause of delay is that the Department of Labor objects to the Shipping Board expending this money; and yet the President has absolute control of the Secretary of Labor. Now, this other bill is introduced, an emergency bill, appropriating $60,000,000 dollars for housing Government employees or the employees of various shipyards and institutions of the Government. That money is to be expended by the Secretary of Labor. There is a confusion of duties, a duplication of the same duty by two different departments of the Government officered by appointment from the President himself. Mr. President, there must be some reason for this. The authors of this bill must have it in mind that possibly when we pass this housing bill, under authority of the so-called Overman bill, the President is going to coordinate or combine the two housing propositions, and, of course, it will all be under the Department of Labor. The President was wrong when he asked for the former law. May he not be wrong about the pending bill?

Mr. President, is it fair to the country and to the Congress to have matters conducted in this way? There is not any doubt that if the President would come to Congress and ask that he be given authority to combine and coordinate the various departments of the War and Navy, even though he has that power already, it would be regranted to him; but now we are asked that he shall not only absolutely control the affairs that affect the Army and the Navy, but that he shall control the affairs that affect the civil departments of the Government; and the persistence with which Senators insist that none of these civil powers shall be eliminated from the bill, when nobody has shown the necessity for their existence in the President, makes me feel that there is something back of this bill that we do not understand, especially after the statement of the Senator from North Carolina on yesterday.

Nobody, I take it, would openly come out and say that we ought to delegate to the President the power to make the laws of the country, and yet in no other way will the President be relieved of the necessity of coming to Congress once in a while for the things that he feels to be necessary to be written into law, but that is what the Senator complains about.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President. I hate to interrupt the Senator, because if I do so it will be taken out of his time, but I think he misunderstood me; that is all. I do not want to take up his time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I said in the beginning, I want us to win this war. I want to do everything that I ought to do to help win the war, and I have voted unlimited power to the President for this purpose, but I dislike very much to have Congress stultify itself in this way, when the President apparently is unwilling to submit the reasons he has for asking for the passage of the bill. I understand that two Members of the Senate—one a Democrat and one a Republican—called on the President and asked him what specific powers he wanted, what he wanted to do, and his reply was, "It is difficult to express in words." He has not asked us for specific power. He has not come to us and stated, as I think he ought to have done, just what he needs that he does not have. Nobody would deny him any power that he needs, but is it right for Congress to sit here and vote blindly for legislation which it believes unwise simply because the friends of the President say he wants it and that he will give no reason for it?

Why, it has been stated frequently that the Senate and the Congress are falling into disrepute, because they have ceased to function. Why have they ceased to function? Because they allow bills to be prepared outside of the Congress and presented here, and thus with scarcely an opportunity to read them enact them into law. And then the very Senators who claimed to speak for the President when they urged immediate action afterwards arise in the Senate and accuse the Senate of having legislated hurriedly and unwisely. What is happening to this measure now? No two Senators agree on its purpose or on what can and will be done under it. Is this to be another mistake which the President may correct by his decree hereafter? Congress will justly be in disrepute if it continues to so legislate.

What objection can there be to the proposition of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] of giving to the President—I know he possesses it now, but if he wants it repeated, all right—the power to coordinate and consolidate and operate the Departments of the War and Navy, the departments which have to do with the war? Nobody would object to that; but it is insisted that we must do here just what was done in the railroad bill. You put into that bill certain things which apply only to conditions of peace, because there was an opportunity to do it. It is a mistake, Senators, because we are not legislating wisely now. We are legislating under hysteria and should be careful lest we make vital mistakes; we are willing to meet the extraordinary conditions with extraordinary measures. But you ought not to ask us, the President ought not to ask us, to stultify ourselves by voting contrary to what we know to be right, what every Senator in this body knows to be right, simply because there is an emergency, and couple the necessity for consolidation with this proposition to control civil affairs, which in a republic are better controlled by the people's legislature than by an autocrat, however wise or benevolent.

So, Mr. President, I have been confused. As I said in the beginning, I intended to vote for this bill, believing that it contained many unnecessary things, many unwise things, but also believing that possibly it might be a spur to the President, who is Commander in Chief and must be held responsible, to do the things which the country is demanding and for lack of which it is suffering to-day.

When the Congress proposed to establish a director of munitions and a war cabinet, the President objected. He said he would not have them and the bills died. He then assumed to do about the same thing in another and less efficient way. I regret that he seems inclined to ignore Congress; but so long as he accomplishes the needs of war I shall not bitterly complain. I am glad his very opposition to the war measures proposed by the Military Affairs Committee has induced him to recognize the need of big men of experience and ability. If he wants to humiliate Congress, if he wants to say, "I will not take what you suggest; I will have my own way about it," I will submit to that if it helps to win the war, if it helps us to meet the supreme needs of the hour; but I want that done. I feel that it must be done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there is a certain phase of this matter that I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate, and its recital must involve, in turn, a very brief review of the history of this legislation and other legislation seeking to accomplish the same object.

The Senate will remember that in the month of January the Committee on Military Affairs reported to the Senate a bill to create the office of director of munitions, an official to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and to be given jurisdiction over the production and manufacture of those munitions of war which the President, in his discretion, might decide could be wisely allotted to such an officer. As the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has just stated, the President determined that that bill must not pass—or, in any event, that if it did pass he would veto it—and he declared at that time, by inference at least, that no improvement was necessary in the war-making machinery; and, in fact, his Secretary of War, in testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs, told the committee in so many words that no activity of the committee was useful; that he was entirely up to date. Those sentences will be found in the printed testimony as given by the Secretary of War. As the Senator from Michigan has truly stated, it was inevitable that the bill creating a director of munitions should, in effect, die, as, of course, it would be impracticable for the Congress to pass such an act merely to have it vetoed by the President.

Since the time when the Secretary of War informed the Committee on Military Affairs that none of its suggestions were of value and that he and his administration were up to date, there has been a very extensive reorganization of the War Department. That reorganization in a very large degree follows out those recommendations of the Committee on Military Affairs which were adjudged to be of no value by the Secretary. I have rejoiced from time to time when I have seen these reforms and improvements inaugurated in the War Department. I believed in January, as I believe to-day, that they were inevitable; that they had to be done; that the force of events, more powerful than the prejudices and desires of mere persons, would eventually compel the administration to inaugurate and put into effect many of the reforms suggested by the Committee on Military Affairs. It would be interesting, if there were time to go into detail, to recite some of the things that have been done since the Secretary appeared before the committee and which the members of the committee, either jointly or severally, recommended should be done; but it would not throw any light upon this discussion, and I shall not indulge in it at this time.

To follow along the development of the idea of a director of munitions, an office which each of our allies in this war has created by the advice of the parliaments of those respective countries, but which we thus far have not in a statutory sense created, the Senate will remember that step by step during the last two months the chairman of the War Industries Board has, by Executive order, in one conspicuous instance at least, contained in a personal letter addressed by the President to Mr. Baruch, the chairman of the War Industries Board, been clothed with certain authority over the production and manufacture of certain materials needed in the waging of the war. Mr. Baruch appeared before the Military Affairs Committee two or three weeks ago and told us something of the power that he is exercising, and it occurred I think to every member of the committee instantly, upon hearing his testimony, that the administration must have made up its mind that a directorate of munitions was a pretty good thing after all.

Now, this has a very distinct relation to the terms of this bill, and the status of the chairman of the War Industries Board is a thing which should be thoroughly understood before we make up our minds to the belief that the bill introduced by the Senator from North Carolina will have any effect whatsoever upon Mr. Baruch's status or his duties.

The first day that the bill was brought before the Senate, and when the Senator from North Carolina had the floor, I undertook to secure from him a definition of the term "governmental agency." I had in mind also, had the colloquy lasted a little longer, but I did not care to press it, to ask the Senator from North Carolina what was meant by the term "executive and administrative agencies, commissions, bureaus, or offices." This short colloquy which occurred will be found on page 4505 of the RECORD:

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator inform the Senate as to the definition of the term "governmental agency"?

A term which I believe the Senator from North Carolina had used in his remarks.

Mr. OVERMAN. Any agency established by Congress.

I concur, with no great pride of opinion, in the definition given by the Senator from North Carolina. If it is true, as the Senator from North Carolina said upon that occasion, that the term "governmental agency" is confined to those agencies created by an act of Congress, the bill introduced by the Senator from North Carolina is not nearly as extensive in its provisions nor will it bring about many of the tremendous improvements claimed for it by him, for under its terms and in its operation the President is confined in this transfer and redistribution of function to the field occupied solely and entirely by executive and administrative offices, bureaus, boards, and commissions, which according to the definition given by the Senator from North Carolina, the introducer of the bill, and who must therefore reflect the ideas of the administration itself, means only those boards, offices, and bureaus that have been created by an act of Congress.

If this interpretation is correct, we find that the War Industries Board is not and can not be included in the term "executive agency" or "administrative agency," for the War Industries Board is merely one of the subcommittees of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense. Let us see what the Council of National Defense is, and ascertain if it can be considered as an administrative or executive agency of the Government. The Council of National Defense was created by an act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, and in the printed copy on page 34 will be found the section which created the council:

SEC. 2. That a Council of National Defense is hereby established for the coordination of industries and resources for the national security and welfare, to consist of—

And then follow the designations of five Cabinet officers.

That the Council of National Defense shall nominate to the President, and the President shall appoint, an advisory commission, consisting of not more than seven persons, each of whom shall have special knowledge of some industry—

And so forth.

The members of the advisory commission shall serve without compensation.

* * * * * * *

The advisory commission shall hold such meetings as shall be called by the council or be provided by the rules and regulations adopted by the council for the conduct of its work.

And then this significant language:

That it shall be the duty of the Council of National Defense to supervise and direct investigations and make recommendations to the President and the heads of the executive departments.

The Council of National Defense and its advisory commission, Mr. President, are not clothed with any executive power, and, in my humble judgment, can not be included in the category of executive or administrative agencies. Their functions are purely advisory.

Further on in the act the advisory commission or the council itself, I forget which, is authorized to appoint subcommittees for the purpose of subdividing this work of investigation and the making of recommendations following investigation. One of those subcommittees in the process of time grew to be the War Industries Board, and the War Industries Board is no more clothed with executive authority and power and can no more be termed an executive or administrative agency than can a committee of the Senate.

Many Senators defending this bill upon the floor have sought to persuade the Senate that under its terms the President could transfer executive and administrative functions from one officer now holding those functions to any other officer appointed according to law, but the bill expressly says that such transfers must be confined to officials, boards, and bureaus who are performing executive and administrative duties.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The point just made by the Senator from New York has given me some concern. I am not sure but that his interpretation is correct, but I beg his attention to the peculiar phraseology used in section 2. The authority given to utilize, coordinate, or consolidate the commissions, bureaus, or agencies is limited, namely, to executive and administrative commissions, bureaus, or agencies, but the clause following reads:

To transfer—

That is, the President is authorized to transfer—any duties or powers from one existing department—

And the word "department" was not used in the former clause—commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another.

I have, I confess, some doubt about it in my mind, but I am rather inclined to believe that there is no limitation in that authority. It is not limited to executive and administrative commissions, departments, and bureaus. I suppose the Senator from New York has given thought to that peculiar omission in the clause?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will say in reply to the Senator from Iowa that the terms of the bill and its purposes have been a mystery to me from the day it was introduced. I can not understand what it means. I am a layman in the law, but when I read at the bottom of the first page:

The President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary.

I am inclined to believe that he is confined in that redistribution to executive agencies.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from New York will observe that the first section deals with redistribution, and I agree with him that it is limited to the redistribution among executive departments, commissions, bureaus, and so forth. Section 3 then takes the matter up and introduces the authority to utilize and consolidate. There the bill is broadened by the introduction of the word "administrative," and then, in order to make assurance doubly sure, the President is given authority to transfer duties or powers, and in that part of the bill the qualifying words are omitted entirely. I do not know just how it will be interpreted, but if I were asked to interpret it I would say that this is a cumulative power, and that the last clause gives the President the power to transfer the powers and duties of any department, any bureau, any commission, or any office to another department, bureau, commission, or office.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not want to interrupt the Senator if he needs all his time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will yield to the Senator for a question or a statement, if he wishes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to say that I am inclined to think the Senator from New York is correct about the construction of the bill being confined to executive duties, because all the officers of the Government are legislative, judicial, or executive officers. Do I understand the Senator's point to be that the Council of National Defense is not an executive office?

Mr. WADSWORTH. So I believe.

Mr. KELLOGG. That it is merely advisory?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Merely advisory; and so is the War Industries Board merely an advisory body. I do not know how confident the Senator from Iowa is in his construction of this language. I am not confident in my construction of it, I freely admit. But if the construction of the Senator from Iowa is the true construction it would follow that the President could continue indefinitely to appoint any number of subcommittees of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense and construe the occupants of those offices as being eligible for exercising executive power. He could cover the United States with subcommittees of the Council of National Defense if the construction of the Senator from Iowa is correct, and I do not say that it is not. I am puzzled about this language. I am almost as much puzzled about it as some of the supporters of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. That would be impossible.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator from Iowa is correct in stating that the President could transfer any duties of an executive character now reposed in an office created by law to any existing department, commission, bureau, agency, or officer, then there is no limit whatsoever.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say to the Senator from New York that this is not the first time the question has arisen. It is the first time it has arisen on the floor of the Senate, but it arose in the committee. The Senator from New York may have heard the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] say that he offered the amendment inserting the word "administrative" in order to remove the advisory committee from the operation of the bill. I have no doubt he was correct in that. I think that was the purpose. But it was suggested then, and to my mind ever since, as being very peculiar that the same qualification, the same limitation, was not introduced in the succeeding phrase.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have discussed this phase of the matter for the purpose partially of explaining my attitude with respect to the amendment which I offered yesterday and which the Senate adopted to-day. According to my reading of this language, Mr. Ryan, who upon yesterday was named as Chief of the Division of Aircraft Production in the War Department, is not an executive agency nor an administrative agency according to the definition given by the author of this bill, Mr. OVERMAN. My purpose in introducing the amendment was to make it possible for the President to give to Mr. Ryan executive powers in handling the aircraft program, for, according to my reading of this language, the bill would not permit such a thing. The Senator from Iowa thinks it would. The Senator from North Carolina thinks it would not, as I understand him.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said I agreed with what the Senator said, that it applied to a Government agency created by Congress. I contend that every man appointed under the national-defense act is an administrative agent provided by law giving the President the power to appoint.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the act creating the Council of National Defense defines their duties, and they are directed to advise the President. That is not an executive office.

Mr. OVERMAN. They could not be created except by some law passed, and Mr. Ryan was appointed, if at all, under the national-defense act.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; Mr. Ryan was not appointed according to any specific act of Congress. He was appointed by Executive order to be the head of a division, but the President can not confer upon Mr. Ryan under the terms of this bill, as I read it, the power to enter into a contract and expend Government money unless, of course, the amendment which I did offer was adopted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. An officer who can not expend money and can not enter into contracts on behalf of the Government can scarcely be said to be holding an executive office in the true sense of the term.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think he is holding an executive administrative office; and the President can transfer functions that are not provided by law to such persons under the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The money that was appropriated for the procurement of aircraft was to be expended by the War Department, was it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Secretary of War has authority to expend that money for the purposes for which it was appropriated, as I understand?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He has.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Gen. Squier was the head of the Signal Corps of the Army, which included, among its various duties, the Aviation Service. Is that correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from New York if there is not authority in the law for the President of the United States, who really is the responsible executive officer, to appoint officers of the Army or civilian employees of the Army to conduct and execute the various branches of this work over which the Secretary of War has complete legal authority, and the head of which, up to the present time at least, is Gen. Squier? Is there any limitation upon the existing authority of the President to segregate the details of this work, and through the Secretary of War or through Gen. Squier, or whoever takes Gen. Squier's place, to appoint military or civil officers to expend this money and to get the results which Congress expected when it appropriated it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, Mr. President, there is no restriction on the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to order any Army officer to do anything; and, according to my judgment, he can establish any state of affairs inside the War Department or inside the Navy Department, in the matter of administration or the distribution of executive powers among Army and Navy officers under his authority as Commander in Chief; but this bill has been advertised all over the country as being far more sweeping than that. We are going to have the millennium under this bill, according to the prophecies of its advocates. The impression is being created—which I think is a false one—that under this bill the President can take a function of the War Department and give it to a member of an advisory committee of the Council of National Defense. I do not think he can. There will be no end to this puzzle, I fear.

I feel somewhat guilty in indulging in this discussion, because I am conscious of not getting anywhere; and, frankly, Senators, I have not heard any considerable group of Senators get anywhere in all this discussion as to what this bill really means; what it is intended to do or what is going to be done under its provisions.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] stated yesterday—and he has been a justice of the highest court of his home State—that this bill would not affect the Interstate Commerce Commission in the review of railway rates. It seems to me that early in the discussion, if I remember correctly, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] expressed it as his opinion at that time that the Interstate Commerce Commission was not included in this bill. I think that expression was drawn out in a colloquy with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who has made a more extensive study of the railway and transportation problem than has any other Member of this body, states that it will affect the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] states that it will affect the Federal Reserve Board. I do not know; the author of the bill can not tell us; and the President declines to say anything about it, though the bill comes from him. In spite of this doubt that has been thrown into the minds of able lawyers upon this floor, it is still insisted that this bill must pass without any amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Surely no one questions that this bill gives the right to any President during the war to transfer the functions either of the Interstate Commerce Commission or of the Federal Reserve Board to any Government agency to which he may see fit to transfer them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the view of the Senator from Georgia; I concur in it; but the Senator from Arkansas disagrees, and he is a supporter of the bill.

Mr. President, the introduction of this bill, the date of which is printed on its face as February 6, followed almost immediately the report from the Committee on Military Affairs of the director of munitions bill; a bill which was specific in its terms; a bill which every Senator could thoroughly understand; a bill which the administration could thoroughly understand; a bill which the entire public of the United States could understand; a bill introduced and reported to the Senate with the same object in view as this bill has, if we are to believe the introducer and supporters of this bill; and yet not even the introducer and supporters of this bill can tell what its field of power is. I am tempted to believe—I am not thoroughly convinced of it—but I am tempted to believe that this bill was introduced on February 6, within a few days of the report of the director of munitions bill, to befog the issue.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. FALL. The Senator from New York has just said that anyone whomsoever could without difficulty understand exactly the meaning of the bill to which he has referred, which was reported from the Military Affairs Committee—the director of munitions bill. Is that, in the judgment of the Senator, not the reason that it is impossible to pass it? [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a contributory reason, I have no doubt; but I regard it as unfortunate, Mr. President, that there should have been substituted for a bill such as the director of munitions bill, which had the same object in view as has been explained on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from North Carolina, and which is perfectly plain, and which everybody can understand—I regard it as unfortunate that there has been substituted for that a bill which no two men agree upon as to its terms and meaning; and I can not help being impressed with the idea, as I said a few moments ago, that there was a very clever purpose in view when this bill—Senate bill 3771—was introduced. The public attention was to be diverted from the director of munitions bill. Week after week has gone by since that time. Delays have accumulated. Time has been lost and millions of dollars have been spent ineffectively. The Overman bill may meet the situation, but no Senator, nor even the President, has been able to say when, where, or how.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My time has expired.

Mr. LODGE. I will take my own time and ask the Senator a question. I was going to ask the Senator, in connection with what he was just saying, whether he had not overlooked what is the real purpose of the bill, which is to show that the Senators who have been thinking for themselves had failed to carry their bill, and that the President had carried substantially the same provisions in a bill of his own, thus deriving great personal satisfaction and comfort from it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I could not answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts unless I were a mind reader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, about one hour ago I made a statement in relation to the appropriation asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury for the increase in the Aviation Signal Corps for the year 1918. I was mistaken in one particular. I stated that there was an additional appropriation of $200,000,000 asked for over and above the $200,000,000 deficit requested. Instead of being $200,000,000 it was $250,000,000. The amount I named was $50,000,000 too small.

In order that the RECORD may be straight in that matter and it may be seen that the $200,000,000 asked for was a deficit and the $250,000,000 was for authorized contracts yet to be made, I wish to read into the RECORD the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, dated March 12, 1918, addressed to the President of the Senate, transmitting the estimate submitted by Benedict Crowell, Acting Secretary of War. The Secretary's letter reads as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 12, 1918.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress copy of a communication from the Acting Secretary of War of the 11th instant, submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation in the sum of $200,000,000, required by the Signal Corps of the Army for "Increase in aviation, Signal Corps, 1918," being additional to the appropriation of $640,000,000 made for this object in public act No. 29, July 24, 1917. In addition to the appropriation of $200,000,000 requested, the estimate also provides for contract authorizations not to exceed $250,000,000. The necessity for the appropriation and legislation asked and the reasons for their submission at this time are fully set forth in the letters of the Acting Secretary of War and the Chief Signal Officer herewith.

Respectfully, W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

The letter of the Acting Secretary of War, dated March 11, 1918, reads as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 11, 1918.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith, for transmission to Congress, a deficiency estimate for an additional appropriation of $200,000,000 required by the Signal Corps to cover deficiencies existing in the special appropriation of $640,000,000 made by Congress in the act approved July 24, 1917, to temporarily increase the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and for other purposes therein specified.

In addition to the cash appropriation of $200,000,000 requested, the estimate provides for contract authorizations not to exceed $250,000,000. The Chief Signal Officer states that it will be necessary to incur obligations to that extent before the close of the current fiscal year in excess of the cash appropriations.

It is requested that this estimate be forwarded to Congress at the earliest possible date for consideration in connection with the pending urgent deficiency bill.

Very respectfully, BENEDICT CROWELL,
Acting Secretary of War.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. President, that is the estimate I had reference to in the statement based upon the question asked by the Senator from New York.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the Senator from North Carolina, having the bill in charge, if he will not agree to adjourn at this time, because it is quite evident that we can not get a vote to-day; many Senators have already left the Chamber, and I think there will be no time conserved in holding the Senate in session during the remaining 20 minutes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The order of the Senate was to adjourn at half past 1 in order that Senators and the employees of the Senate might join the parade. I suppose that most Senators now here would like to have lunch, and it is very evident that we shall have no vote to-day. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., Friday, April 26, 1918) took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, April 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 26, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Heavenly Father, our wisdom, our strength, our courage, our fortitude, pour out upon us, we beseech Thee, abundantly of these gifts and teach us anew the old truth, "United, we stand; divided, we fall."

This day has been set apart by the President of the United States as Liberty Bond Day; and as our young men have responded bravely to give their strength, their courage, their fortitude, and even life, for the liberty we have inherited from our fathers, help us as a people to respond cheerfully, generously, bravely, to the call for means to uphold and sustain our Army and Navy, by giving of our substance to the call of the Nation, that we may stand behind the men behind the guns in this hour of peril. Money, life itself, is nothing without liberty.

Hear us, O Lord, and grant our petition in His Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NONCOMBATANT COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter addressed by the Democratic floor leader of the House, Mr. KITCHIN, to a citizen of Ohio, who addressed him a letter on the subject, concerning the desecration of the wearing of a soldier's uniform by a slacker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, this letter which I would like to insert appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer on April 20 of this year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

STATUE OF FREDERICK THE GREAT.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, on the 26th of February, 1909, I made a speech on this floor against placing a statue of Frederick the Great in this National Capital, for which I was criticized at the time. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an extract from that speech, about half a column.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an extract from the speech he made concerning the statue of Frederick the Great. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would not the gentleman be content to publish also the fact that that statue has been removed from in front of the War College and packed away as old junk in the basement of the War College?

Mr. SHERWOOD. My only object in printing this speech now is that it now appears to be very timely and popular, though at the time I was criticized. It is just a short extract.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the gentleman's remark about the junk in the basement of the War College will appear in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, dated Feb. 26, 1909, p. 3268.]

"The recent dedication of a statue of Frederick the Great in our National Capital indicates the flavor and character of our patriotic ideals. Here let me ask what did Frederick the Great stand for, and what does this statue stand for now? Just what Alexander the Great, Peter the Great, Julius Cæsar, and Napoleon Bonaparte stood for—the crushing out of weaker peoples by the cruel sword in order to build new empires upon their ruins, resting upon bayonets.

"And what did Frederick the Great achieve in his bloody career of empire building that should call for his statue in the Capital of a Republic? It is true he fought great battles and won great victories, but it is also true that in all the 50 battles he fought not one was for the benefit of a single human being, save the imperial head of the Hohenzollern dynasty. When the great Frederick fought the Russians at Zarndorf in August, 1758, he slaughtered 19,000 Russians and left 11,000 Prussians dead upon that awful field. He gave the order that no quarter be given the surrendered Russians, and all were put to the sword.

"It would be fitting and proper that a monument be erected to the German soldiers who fought in our wars, but here is no place for an empire builder who shed the blood of innocent thousands to perpetuate the rule of monarchial heredity.

"After setting up the statue of the great Frederick we can not refuse a place to one of Russia's czars, and France should ask for a statue of Louis XVI, for he sent an army and a navy to fight our battles for us and made the birth of this Republic possible.

"And surely Great Britain, owing to our recent covert alliance, has a right to demand a statue of one of her seventeenth century conquering kings. And should King Edward the Seventh select George the Third, an eighteenth century product, how would that figure look to the patriotic student of American history alongside of George Washington and Benjamin Franklin, Patrick Henry, and old John Adams? And after the monarchs of the Old World have all been represented here there will be no room in the Rotunda for that plain-faced citizen, in citizen's clothes—Abraham Lincoln—now standing under the great Dome. And Thomas Jefferson will have to be pushed aside to make room for some gilded statue with a crown, standing as a silent orator of kingly heredity under the heroic figure of the Goddess of Liberty.

"I hold that this National House of Representatives, the only representative body of the American people, and for the American people, should protest against the tendency so apparent during the administration of Theodore Roosevelt to cast aside the patriotic teachings of the fathers of the Republic and take on royal forms and symbols. This Capitol is all ours, and it should be kept as liberty's central home. It should never be desecrated with the statues of imperial conquerors or kings or emperors or czars, but forever consecrated to the ever-prescient spirit of democracy. We should keep the air of freedom's Capitol wholesome and pure, to illustrate and typify the heroic spirit that characterized the founders of the Republic—Washington and Jefferson and the illustrious peace-loving patriots of 137 years ago."

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 9832. An act to authorize the incorporated town of Seward, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $25,000 for the purpose of constructing dikes, flumes, and other works to confine the waters of Lowell Creek for the protection of said town.

AUGUST GEILFUSS.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, recently an editorial was printed in the Spartanburg Journal, of Spartanburg, S. C., reflecting very much, as I considered, upon Senator TILLMAN and myself. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows: A very prominent citizen of my city was charged, or about to be charged, with a serious offense. He is an American citizen, was born here, and his parents were born here. It so happened that his grandparents, whom he never saw, were born in Germany. He came to us and presented the facts and we asked the district attorney to withhold a warrant arresting the man until a thorough investigation was made. We have been very much criticized on account of our action in asking a Government official to see that a thorough investigation was made before an injustice was done. I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD the editorial referred to and also my answer to that editorial.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the editorial referred to and also his answer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The article and letter referred to are as follows:

[From the Spartanburg Journal.]

ANOTHER CHAPTER.

Congressman SAM J. NICHOLLS addresses a very able communication to the Spartanburg Herald this morning on the subject of the Geilfuss matter, and Mr. NICHOLLS puts up a very able defense for himself and for Mr. Geilfuss. Before Mr. NICHOLLS went to Congress he practiced criminal law in Spartanburg, and it is his business to put up defenses for accused people.

The Congressman has not addressed any communication to the Spartanburg Journal, and possibly we are making a mistake when we have anything to say on the subject, but this is a matter in which the public is so deeply interested that we feel we have a perfect right to discuss it. In so doing we would not question the patriotism of SAM NICHOLLS for one minute, because all of us in Spartanburg and practically everyone in South Carolina knows that there is no more patriotic spirit in Washington than SAM NICHOLLS, but we do believe that he has made a mistake in this instance, and we believe that he will eventually realize it. It was an unfortunate thing for SAM NICHOLLS and for the county that our Congressman had anything at all to do with this matter.

There are one or two things about this matter that we would like for some one to explain to us.

Why did Mr. Geilfuss, if he knew that he had done nothing wrong and was convinced that he had not committed any crime against the laws of the United States, see fit to go to Washington and ask Mr. TILLMAN and Mr. NICHOLLS to intercede for him. If he had done nothing, if he knew that he could not be convicted, why was it necessary for him to make the trip and lay so many facts before the officials?

Why could not this statement and investigation wait until a warrant was issued for his arrest and the case came on for a hearing?

Why did he have to take with him to Washington two supporters to substantiate what he said about the matter?

What right has the Representative of the people to issue orders to a Federal official that he must not arrest a man until after investigation has taken place? Why not arrest him and then let the investigation take place?

We honestly think that the charge against Mr. Geilfuss was a trumped-up affair and of little importance one way or the other, and if he had been tried and convicted of receiving goods stolen from the United States Government it would have amounted to little, but to save our life we can not see where this fact excuses Senator TILLMAN, Congressman NICHOLLS, and District Attorney Thurmond. Mr. NICHOLLS has been and is an able Representative in Congress for this district, but this is one time when our Congressman made a mistake, and if he addressed fifty letters to Spartanburg newspapers he will never be able to persuade the Spartanburg public that he was in the right.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 22, 1918.

EDITOR THE SPARTANBURG HERALD:

I am just in receipt of your paper of Saturday, April 20, and have read with a great deal of interest, on the first page, column 1, the article headed "High officials interested in Spartanburg case; some facts involved in rumors afloat concerning August Geilfuss's connection with case at Wadsworth. Senator TILLMAN sends telegram. Conviction of soldiers by court-martial threatened to involve local baker in violation of Federal law." I do not know who wrote this article, and I do not care, but I do know that from the facts which were presented to me in the matter it is absolutely unfair to Senator TILLMAN, Mr. Geilfuss, and myself. I do not care to get into a newspaper controversy, and am not trying to do so in this case. However, I believe, in justice to Senator TILLMAN, Mr. Geilfuss, and myself, some reply to the article and also to the editorial relative to the article should be made.

The facts that have been disclosed to me are as follows: Mr. W. M. Floyd, Mr. S. L. Rigby, and Mr. A. Geilfuss came to my office some days ago and told me that Mr. Geilfuss was expecting to be arrested on a charge of receiving stolen goods, the property of the United States Government. They also told me that they believed that certain people in Spartanburg were trying to persecute Mr. Geilfuss and to injure his business because of the fact that they claimed he was pro-German. I had some testimonials from the chamber of commerce and other influential bodies of high standing in Spartanburg some months ago that Mr. Geilfuss was a loyal American citizen. These testimonials were published in the papers, and at the same time I wrote a letter to the papers stating that I believed, having known Mr. Geilfuss for years, that he was as loyal as any man in the country, to his Government. These gentlemen impressed me with the fact that somebody was trying to make capital out of the fact that Mr. Geilfuss was a German. It is true that Mr. Geilfuss is of German origin. I understand his grandparents were born in Germany, but his parents have lived in Charleston for years and he was born there, and I would trust him under any conditions to be loyal to this country. I do not think that anyone can question my loyalty, for the only brother that I had has been killed in France by the slaves of the Kaiser, and, aside from my love of country, my love of him would have made me hate the Kaiser and the German Army. I not only received information from the gentlemen that I have mentioned, but I also received a long letter from Hon. R. K. Carson, of Spartanburg, a man for whom I have the highest respect, and I would believe anything that he would tell me, who was disinterested in the case so far as Mr. Geilfuss was concerned, but who had attended the trial of the soldiers charged with stealing the property, giving me the facts as to what took place and urging that, if possible, I see that justice be done.

With all these facts before me, I carried Mr. Geilfuss, Mr. Floyd, and Mr. Rigby to Senator TILLMAN'S office, and we went over the matter thoroughly, they stating to him the circumstances just as they existed, which were about as follows, from Mr. Carson's letter and from the statements of these three gentlemen:

Mr. Geilfuss is a great lover of dogs. He has at this time 8 or 10 registered collies, and he has been very successful with his dogs at the different dog shows throughout the country in winning prizes. When Camp Wadsworth was established at Spartanburg, Mr. Geilfuss threw his home open to many of the soldiers who were there and has entertained them in true southern fashion. In talking with some of the soldiers, they told him that there were a great many bones at the camp, which were left after the meat had been cut off for the use of the soldiers, and that they thought he could obtain the bones for the purpose of feeding them to his dogs. Mr. Geilfuss offered to buy the bones, but, as they were absolutely useless to the Government, he was told by those in authority that he was welcome to take them free of charge, and for some months the Army trucks and occasionally Mr. Geilfuss's own trucks had been carrying sacks of bones to his house to be fed to his dogs. If there was any meat left on the bones that was fit to use in feeding the Army, Mr. Geilfuss had no knowledge of it whatever. The sacks were simply brought from the camp and the bones given to his dogs. On the occasion in question, when the military police seized and searched the sack which Mr. Geilfuss had carried in in his automobile, and which was thrown into the automobile without ever having been opened by him, they found 15 or 20 pounds of bones, together with two cans of condensed milk, two cans of peaches, and one can of pineapple. Of course Mr. Geilfuss does not know how these cans got in the sack. And, of course, I do not know. The only solution of the proposition that I can give is that some soldier had put them in the sack, intending to take them out afterwards for his own use before the sack was delivered to Mr. Geilfuss.

It is preposterous, in my judgment, to think that a man like Mr. Geilfuss, who has subscribed to every liberty-bond issue—in fact, taking out $2,000 in the last one—and a man shipping bread into five or six States, with the biggest bakery south of Washington, and who ships canned goods in by the carload, would be guilty of receiving about a dollar's worth of stolen goods.

These are the facts, briefly, which were stated to me by Mr. Carson, Mr. Floyd, Mr. Rigby, and Mr. Geilfuss. It was further stated to me that Maj. Shanton, who used to be one of Buffalo Bill's broncho busters, was in behind the matter and was seeking notoriety at the expense of one of the most prominent citizens of my city.

After learning these facts from Mr. Carson, Mr. Floyd, Mr. Rigby, and Mr. Geilfuss I became convinced that a great injustice was about to be done Mr. Geilfuss. I have known him for years, and the people of Spartanburg know that up to this time no man has ever questioned his honesty. In view of his past life and in view of the preposterous charge now made against him of stealing $26 worth of canned goods, I was fully convinced that the alleged prosecution was due entirely to the fact that Mr. Geilfuss was of German descent and had been charged by some people with being pro-German.

If Mr. Geilfuss has been guilty at any time of uttering a disloyal statement or entertaining a disloyal sentiment, I have never heard about it, and, on the contrary, in my presence, he has ever asserted his patriotic devotion to his country. My friends have always advised me that he had the same attitude when with them. If he has been guilty of any disloyalty to his country, he should be prosecuted for it, and, if guilty of it, I would be the last man to defend him. If he has been guilty of nothing that would justify any man in prosecuting him for disloyalty, they had no right to persecute him by charging him with petty larceny in stealing $26 worth of canned goods. I thought this an outrage and, in fairness, believed that it should be carefully investigated by the authorities before any warrant was issued against him. It is well enough to say that the issuance of a warrant does not mean conviction. But if you, Mr. Editor, were charged with stealing $26 worth of canned goods, from my knowledge of your past life, I would certainly intervene with the authorities that no warrant be issued until a careful investigation had been made; because I know that even though a jury afterwards declared you innocent, the fact that you were arrested for larceny would be heralded to the world, and the record would remain to embarrass you regardless of your guilt or innocence. In like manner Mr. Geilfuss, who does business in six States, would have his business injured, and the reputation that he has built up by years of hard work and honest living would be impaired, if not destroyed, in the twinkling of an eye. On the records there would be nothing to show that the prosecution was due merely to the fact that he had the misfortune to be born of German parents.

Loyalty is not a matter of ancestry. It is a matter of the heart. In my opinion there can be no punishment too severe for the man who is disloyal to his country, whether he be of German, English, or any other descent, but I think it would be cowardly to prosecute a man like Mr. Geilfuss for stealing canned goods for the sole reason that his grandparents were German and because they can find no evidence against him to justify his prosecution for disloyal utterances to his Government. No sane man in Spartanburg will believe that a man of Mr. Geilfuss's standing would connive with a soldier at Camp Wadsworth to steal condensed milk or pineapple, knowing, as he would, that he would be thereby placing his life, his liberty, and his character in the hands of a soldier in the United States Army whom he had never known before and who any moment could ruin him by reporting his theft. Anyone would know that Mr. Geilfuss has sense enough to know that the soldier could come to him next week, knowing that he is a man of some means, and demand $10,000 of him under threat of reporting him to the Government for stealing condensed milk.

I trust that politics is not responsible for these allegations as to Senator TILLMAN and myself at this time. I dislike to believe that any man is such a scoundrel that in order to attack either Senator TILLMAN or myself he is willing to ruin the life or the character of a man who has done as much for Spartanburg as has Gus Geilfuss.

As I have stated before, we called upon Senator TILLMAN and, after the facts were stated to him, he, like myself, felt very much outraged, and we did wire to Commissioner Gantt, at Spartanburg, not "ordering" him to do anything, because anybody but a fool knows that a Senator or Congressman has no right to "order" officials of the Government as to what they shall do. We wired Commissioner Gantt asking him not to issue a warrant until he heard from us. At the same time we wired to Hon. W. J. Thurmond, asking him to take the matter up with Commissioner Gantt and to hold same open pending a thorough investigation. All that Senator TILLMAN did, or all that I did in this matter, was to ask the Department of Justice not to have a man whom we considered absolutely innocent arrested until a thorough investigation had been made. I, of course, have copies of the telegrams, and also a copy of the letter which I wrote to Mr. Thurmond. The latter is rather lengthy, and I therefore have not put it in this statement, because of the space it would take up. However, if you desire it, I will be glad to send you a copy of same.

In your editorial you state: "The part of the gentlemen in Congress is so irregular, however, it is certainly worthy of mention, for if there is an authority for Senators and Congressmen to give orders to Federal magistrates it is not generally appreciated by the public." You know as well as I do that there is no such authority. You also know, however, or you should know, that the mere fact that a man happens to be a Member of the Senate of the United States or a Member of Congress does not preclude him from making a request of any official, whether he be State or Federal, to investigate a thing thoroughly in order that justice may be done. Recently, or to be more definite, during the Confederate reunion in Washington last June, a young man who works in one of the cotton mills in my district was unfortunate enough to come to Washington, get crazy drunk, pull out his pistol on Pennsylvania Avenue, and start shooting. One ball from his revolver happened to strike a lady whom he had never seen. He was arrested, put in jail, and appealed to me for help. I secured a bondsman for him and got him out, and am now interceding with the district attorney here, with a view of having his punishment made not so severe as it would be made under ordinary circumstances. I conceive it my duty as a Member of Congress to look after my constituents in every way possible when I think they are right; and, regardless of what the enemies of Mr. Geilfuss might say, as long as I am in Congress I propose to do my duty as I see it. I do not believe that District Attorney Thurmond or that Commissioner Gantt would take orders from any Member of the Senate or any Member of Congress. I do believe, however, that both these gentlemen are always willing to give heed to requests not only from men in official life but from any private citizen. I can not conceive that because a man has been honored by his people to represent them he loses his right as a private citizen to request of an official of the Government that justice be done. If that is the case, we should not be fighting now for world democracy.

As I have stated before, I think that the article in your paper, and also the editorial, are absolutely unfair. If I thought for a moment that Mr. Geilfuss was pro-German and was doing anything to deter us in bringing this war to a prompt, successful conclusion the people who know me will realize that I would never have turned my finger over for him, because, however, a man's grandparents happened to have been born in Germany, that does not convince me that he can not be a loyal American citizen. This fact has been brought very closely to my attention on account of my intimate connection with Hon. JULIUS KAHN, who is the ranking Republican member of the Military Affairs Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member. He was born in Germany and moved to this country from Germany. However, in a great many of the fights on the floor he has led the administration measures here for our Government.

The only object I had, and I know the only object that Senator TILLMAN had, in this matter was to try to see that Mr. Geilfuss got a square deal and not have his name besmirched without just cause.

In conclusion, I want to say that since being a Member of Congress I have tried to represent all my people justly, equally, and fairly. I intend to make the race again for Congress, upon the assumption that it is my duty, as well as my pleasure, to represent my people as before stated. If I thought, as your paper insinuates, that I had to sacrifice my principles or my rights as an American citizen for the simple reason that I am a Member of Congress, I would be glad to retire and let some other man who did not agree with my ideas fill this position. I have no apology to make to any man or set of men for my attitude in this matter.

I hope that you will give this communication the same publicity which you gave the article which I consider reflects very much upon Senator TILLMAN, District Attorney Thurmond, Commissioner Gantt, Mr. Geilfuss, and myself.

I am in receipt of letter from Mr. Wyche, assistant district attorney, in which he states that he had talked to Commissioner Gantt and had requested that no warrant be issued until a thorough investigation was made. This is what the law contemplates, and this is all that we asked.

Yours, very truly,

SAM J. NICHOLLS.

ELECTIONS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I nominate and move the election of the following members of committees, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee nominations.

FINIS J. GARRETT, of Tennessee, to be chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs; JOHN W. RAINEY, of Illinois, to be a member of the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other nominations?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to place in nomination, not for the same committee assignments, but because

I think it might all be taken care of in the same vote, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FESS, to be a Member of the Committee on Rules, to take the place of Mr. LENROOT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts nominates the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FESS, as a member of the Committee on Rules. Is there any other nomination? [After a pause.] The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] to elect these various candidates to the committee places named.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

THE WAR.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Speaker, I have here a resolution adopted by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of New York, which I send to the desk and ask to have read in my time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
IN ASSEMBLY, April 12, 1918.

By unanimous consent, Mr. Sage offered for the consideration of the joint assembly of senate and assembly the following resolution:

"Whereas the most important task before the United States is to win the war; and

"Whereas the war will not be won until the peaceful development of all free peoples is guaranteed by the strength of their own will: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of New York (both houses concurring), That the State of New York pledges all its resources to the vigorous prosecution of the war until Prussian autocracy has been defeated; and be it further

"Resolved, That the State of New York favors the entrance of the United States after the war into a league of nations to safeguard the peace that must be won by the joint military forces of the allied nations; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of these resolutions be sent by the Secretary of State to the President and to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and to each of the Senators and Representatives from New York."

Which concurrent resolution was agreed to.

STATE OF NEW YORK, COUNTY OF ALBANY,
Office of the Clerk of the Assembly, ss:

I, Fred W. Hammond, clerk of the assembly, do hereby certify that I have compared the foregoing record of proceedings of the assembly of April 12, 1918, relative to the resolution therein set forth with the original thereof as contained in the original official copy of the journal of proceedings of the assembly of said date and that the same is a true and correct transcript of said journal of proceedings in so far as the same relates to said resolution and of the whole thereof.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand this 23d day of April, 1918.

FRED W. HAMMOND,
Clerk of the Assembly.

Indorsed: Filed April 23, 1918. Francis M. Hugo, Secretary of State.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
Office of the Secretary of State, ss:

I have compared the preceding copy of resolution adopted by the Senate and Assembly of the State of New York with the original resolution on file in this office, and do hereby certify that the same is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

Given under my hand and the seal of office of the secretary of state, at the city of Albany, this 23d day of April, in the year 1918.

[SEAL.] C. W. TAFT,
Second Deputy Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11259.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution——

Mr. FOSTER. Could it not wait until to-morrow? Is it going to take any discussion?

Mr. PARK. Well, I can not say that.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to get in with this bill now.

Mr. PARK. Then I will wait until to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will please wait.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would recognize the gentleman from Georgia if it is a pressing matter, but if it is not the Chair would wish him to wait until to-morrow.

Mr. PARK. We can wait until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11259.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11259, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11259, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

The CHAIRMAN. At the time the committee rose there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall ask permission to proceed for 10 minutes, although I do not think I shall use that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "alloys," strike out the words "and chemical compounds."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offered this amendment the other evening just before the committee rose, and I asked that it should be considered as pending in order that I might further examine into this question and that the committee in charge might further examine into the question as to whether or not it would be wise to strike out the words "and chemical compounds." As I understand it, in the bill as originally drafted by the department and submitted to the committee, chemical compounds were not included, and in the hearings it was admitted by several witnesses that such a provision would immensely broaden the bill. I was inclined to think at the beginning that it would be very unwise to go so far as to include all the chemical compounds of these various metals and other substances provided for in the bill; so I made a rather careful investigation of the matter, and after talking with some gentlemen who are experts on this question I came to the conclusion that it would interfere with the objects sought to be accomplished by this bill if chemical compounds were not included. I have decided, therefore, not to press my amendment.

A word or two as to the merits of the bill. I am in very grave doubt, gentlemen, I confess, and the more I study this bill the graver my doubts become, as to the wisdom of its passage, and yet I think that I shall probably support it. There is no use in mincing words about it, though. It is another one of those socialistic price-fixing contraptions, a number of which we have enacted, and I think that few will say, so far, with much success. Then, too, it involves the expenditure of an amount of money that no one here can possibly guess. This revolving fund of $50,000,000 may amount to hundreds of millions of dollars more before we get through, and yet I doubt whether there is any other way now of immediately obtaining certain supplies that seem to be absolutely necessary for our effective participation in this war.

One point about this bill appeals to me rather strongly, and that is that the powers and duties conferred by it are to be administered by the Secretary of the Interior, whom I regard as undoubtedly the sanest, ablest, and the least politically selfish man in the Cabinet. [Applause.] Then, in so far as this bill will accomplish the permanent development of the industries mentioned, it is a good thing. I happened to be a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, which drafted the much maligned Payne law. At that time we seriously took up the question of the development and encouragement of most of the various industries described in this bill. We gave the question serious consideration, we had hearings, and we ended by imposing a substantial protective duty on almost every one of the materials named in this bill, with the idea of encouraging these industries to the extent that they would be able to fill all the needs of this Nation, both in peace and war times. As to whether or not those industries would have by this time developed to the extent necessary I, of course, can not tell, but the fact is they never had a chance, because within a very short time the Underwood law came along, and an entirely different method of treating these subjects was adopted. Duties in every case were reduced to a point where it was frankly intended that the importation of those various articles should be stimulated to the greatest possible degree. The industry at home was deliberately intended to be discouraged and the importations of those materials encouraged in the development of a policy in precise juxtaposition to the policy proposed in this bill. In no case was a higher duty imposed than that which was expected to produce the largest revenue by encouraging the largest possible importation.

Take all the metals named in this bill. Under the Payne law a substantial protective duty was placed upon them. Under the Underwood law they were lumped in a bracket bearing a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem and importations, of course, were very greatly increased.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. I gather, then, from the view of the gentleman from Ohio that this is a species of protection, but at the expense of the American people and the United States Treasury, while the system of protection favored by the gentleman under the old law was at the expense of the foreigner and for the benefit of the United States Treasury. Is that correct?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I agree entirely with my colleague. Of course I do not desire to precipitate any political argument here. I am simply referring to the fact that if the system adopted at that time had been allowed to continue probably the necessity for this bill would not be apparent to-day.

Mr. SLOAN. Just one word. If mayhap the gentleman discovered anything political in any suggestion of mine, I trust he will withdraw it from the RECORD.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I, of course, acquit the gentleman of any such intention. He has conspicuously refrained from introducing politics into any debate during this session, and very properly so.

Mr. SHERLEY. I took your question and answer to be for the purpose of illustrating that you both believed in protective theories.

Mr. LONGWORTH. We do, and, apparently, so does the gentleman's party in this instance, for this measure is the most highly protective measure, in a sense, that one can conceive of, because we are to take the money directly from the Treasury and give it to certain gentlemen for the purpose of developing these industries.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. You mean everything is protected except the Treasury?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Everything is protected in this bill except the Treasury. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield with pleasure to my friend from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if these various commodities that it is intended to develop here do not now command a very high price in the markets of the world?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I presume they do.

Mr. SLAYDEN. A very high price.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the reason they command such a high price is that their development in this country was interfered with, so that we are now not able to supply the needs of the market, and therefore the prices have immensely increased. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, may I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that these very high prices form sufficient inducement for the development of these enterprises without going into socialistic propositions?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, the gentleman may be right, and yet the responsible authorities of this administration come to us and say that the only way we can supply the requisite amount of these materials is to take money directly out of the Treasury and give it to the gentlemen whom they desire to subsidize.

Now, I am one of those who believe that this country should supply everything that is necessary for the happiness and prosperity of its people in time of peace and for their security in time of war—everything that is climatically possible to produce in this country. According to the reports that are before us now it is possible to produce to the full extent these specific articles which up to this time we have been relying on foreign countries to supply to us. Under the circumstances it seems to me that it will be difficult for gentlemen, no matter how or in what school of thought reared, to say after this war is over that if we are justified now in taking more than $50,000,000 from the Treasury of the American people and giving it directly to persons to build up these industries now, after this war is over it ought not to be the policy of this Government to see to it that in an indirect way, under a protective policy, these industries shall be perpetuated. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent Mr. LONGWORTH was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 2, line 15, after the word "thereafter," strike out down to and including the word "terminated," in line 17, and insert in lieu thereof the words "for such period of time as is hereinafter provided."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the question presented by this amendment is the question of whether or not the governmental control of these war minerals shall be definitely fixed or whether it shall be left, as is provided in the bill, to the judgment of the President. The amendment which I have offered is an amendment on page 2, line 15, to strike out this expression, "only until, in the judgment of the President, the agencies and activities herein provided for can be reasonably terminated." I propose that there be inserted in lieu thereof the following expression: "for such period of time as is hereinafter provided."

Mr. MADDEN. Can not you follow that with another amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not just now.

The reason I propose to make the amendment in this form in section 1 is that in section 23 a provision similar to that contained in section 1 is also found. And I want to discuss section 23 and section 1, because they contain the same proposition; and I shall later offer an amendment to section 23 which will definitely limit the time for governmental control to six months. And I want to take the liberty now——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman means six months after the war is terminated?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Six months after the termination of the present war.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I ask a question of the gentleman before he goes to another subject?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman inform us what prevailed upon the committee to put that language in section 1 to which he just referred? What reason did the committee have for putting in the very extraordinary language after the word "thereafter," the language that the gentleman proposes to strike out?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not know.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think this language so unusual and inapt that it must have been put in by design. It could not have been by inadvertence.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Section 23 prescribes the time when the provisions of the act shall cease and uses this language:

SEC. 23. That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect after the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President as soon as in his judgment the agencies and activities herein provided for can be reasonably terminated—

And so forth. Now, I propose, when we reach that section, to offer an amendment which will read as follows:

That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect at the end of six months after the existing state of war between the United States and Germany and between the United States and Austro-Hungary shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the termination of this act shall not affect the exercise of such authority and power herein granted as shall be necessary to speedily wind up the affairs of any enterprise already entered upon or to carry out any guaranty or contract made pursuant to the terms thereof and such termination.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In just a moment. It will be noted that under the provisions of the bill as it is now drawn all of the Government control must last until all of the agencies and activities can be terminated. By a subsequent provision of the law the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to guarantee for a period not to exceed two years a certain price for any one or more of these minerals. Therefore, for illustration, if the war should end in June of next year, and in May of next year an agreement should have been entered into to guarantee a price for two years, none of the provisions of this act could be terminated until the expiration of the two years.

There ought certainly to be no objection to this particular amendment to section 1, because, regardless of whether the period in section 23 shall be left to be six months after the termination of the war or whether it shall be left as it is, this provision will not be harmful. My object in presenting here this provision that it shall be for such period of time as is hereinafter provided was to present the question at one time, the question of whether it would run for a definite period or whether it should be left indefinite.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The question is whether all of the powers shall be granted to the Secretary of the Interior for all of the period of time during which any of the activities started may last or whether it shall be definitely terminated. Some of the powers enumerated in the bill are powers to license all of these products and to regulate their production, the power to condemn property, the power to requisition and take over necessaries, the power to fix the price of necessaries, the power of determining the royalty that shall be paid, and the power in one of these sections is vested in the President of the United States to fix the tariff on all these products. In other words, if the bill remains as it is and if there is any activity at the time of the duration of the war which should carry it on for two years, then the President of the United States should be left with the power to fix the revenue duties for a period of two years; and it is very likely——

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that if some contract should be made or some rule should be established that would endure for two years after the termination of the enforcement of this law, the law would still remain in force for two years, notwithstanding the provision that would make it discontinue?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. That is the present provision?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. And you are seeking to obviate that?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; I am seeking to obviate that by providing a definite time when the law shall cease and still retaining the powers that are necessary in the executive department to finish any matter that may be on hand; and the provision of the amendment that I shall later offer would have all the power that is necessary to terminate and speedily wind up any of the affairs of any enterprise already entered upon. This provision for a definite period of six months after the war is copied to a large extent from the War Finance Corporation bill, which provides a period of six months, which is an ample period for the country to readjust itself and be ready to enact legislation that would be proper in peace times.

In addition to the question of this being a desirable thing, I think there might be grave doubt as to the validity of this law if we did not definitely fix the duration of the emergency created by the war, because much of it would not be within the power of the Congress to enact as a peace measure, and we are reaching out and taking that power because we are in war, and it is the duty of Congress to definitely fix the time of the emergency created by this war; and I think, Mr. Chairman, that——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman indicated that the bill provided somewhere—I have been unable to find it—that the President may in certain contingencies have the power to fix the tariff duties?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not that in violation of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There is some question in my mind as to the validity of the provision here. There is no question of the right of the President to put into effect certain duties if the legislation makes the amount of the duties sufficiently definite. There has been some question in my mind as to the constitutionality of the provision.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What section is that?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is on page 15, in section 14.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That power is clearly vested in Congress—the power to fix duties.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the same provision as is in the food bill, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Affecting tariffs?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But Congress certainly fixes duties under the Constitution.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that this provision is not for the purpose of raising revenues. It is for the purpose of protection.

Mr. FOSTER. For the Government in any law?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. For the protection against imports.

Mr. FESS. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more, so that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may have two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. I want the gentleman to inform the House whether the bill specifies the minerals upon which the Government shall guarantee a price.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It does not. It leaves that to the discretion of the administration.

Mr. FESS. Second, in fixing the price of any mineral, the only way it could be done would be to stand ready to take the product of the mineral.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. FESS. Would that mean that the Government would be under obligation to take all that was produced whether it needed it or not?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It would, except that that is all a matter of regulation, and the selection of the particular mineral upon which a guaranteed price shall be offered is also an administrative matter, and may be covered by regulation. The gentleman's statement would be true, subject to any qualifications that might be put in valid regulations on that subject.

Mr. FESS. I notice that Dr. Smith, who, I think, is an authority on the production of these minerals, if any man in America is, says that we produce 100 per cent of bromine, that we produce only 23 per cent of manganese, but that of magnesite we produce 99 per cent, and of mercury 120 per cent of our supply. In other words, there are many minerals of which we are producing more than we need.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; but it is not to be supposed that the administration, in carrying out this act, would guarantee a price upon minerals of which we are producing plenty without that guaranty.

Mr. FESS. It would be a very foolish thing to do.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The food bill permitted the guaranteeing of the price of only one article—wheat—but this bill permits a guaranteed price of any mineral, and does not propose to limit the guaranty, and it is not to be supposed that the administration would guarantee the price of any mineral of which there is plenty; but there are other provisions of the act which might be used with reference to such a mineral.

Mr. FESS. Suppose we have selected one mineral the production of which is very small in comparison with our needs, but in due process of production we discover a process of producing great quantities. Do we have the freedom to stop the guaranteeing of the price of a mineral, no matter what amount is produced?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. If I may be permitted to repeat my question, there may be some things of which we now produce a small percentage of our needs, but there might be methods of production discovered that would result in a production far in excess of our needs. Now, suppose we have fixed a price upon that article, do we have the authority in the bill so that the administration can qualify or reconsider a decision formerly made before the process of producing the larger quantity had been discovered?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman has asked a question which I think is the most important one in the whole bill, and if he will read the hearings he will find it is one that I sought to bring out when different witnesses were before the committee, the question whether there was any liability of overproduction under a guarantee, and whether the Government would be able to take care of itself in that event. It is a difficult question, and I should say that the Government would be under at least a moral obligation, if not a legal obligation, to carry out any guarantee that it should make, regardless of subsequent developments. Of course, in administering the act great care would need to be exercised in making such a guarantee. For instance, we would not want to have occur in this country what occurred in Australia, where they guaranteed the price of wheat and twice as much wheat was produced as could possibly be used there, and the Government was obliged to buy it, and it has its wheat and no way to ship it. That is a very grave question, and I may say that the effect of this act will depend altogether upon the care taken in the administration. This very feature will require the most care. As to whether the guarantee of a price for a year would so bind the Government that it would have no right six months thereafter to break that guarantee, I do not know. I should doubt if the Government would have the moral right to do that. Of course, legislation authorizing a certain thing might be repealed, and we could repeal the act perhaps at any time.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman recognizes the fact that a substitute might be discovered that would prove a better article for the purpose than the one we had guaranteed, so that the one thing might be entirely useless because of finding a better thing. Evidently we ought to have some protection somewhere.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the administration of this guarantee provision ought to be very carefully guarded, and that it ought to be very rarely used.

Mr. LONDON. If the gentleman will yield, the right to guarantee a price does not exclude the right of the Government to enter into a contract to protect the Government against every possible contingency, including overproduction.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; if that could be embraced——

Mr. LONDON. But could it not be embraced?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Is not that power embraced within the provisions of the bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is. This bill embraces the power to guarantee prices for any one or all of these minerals. It is a general guaranty. It also gives the right to the Secretary of the Interior to go out and purchase and pay a price for these things.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But that does not also give anyone the right to tell a man that he can not produce.

Mr. LONDON. That was not the intent of my question.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Right along that line suggested by yourself a moment ago, would not it be in order under this bill for the President's agent to make a contract with an individual for the production of a given amount of such commodity?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is within the terms of the bill. I should think in administering the bill this provision would be used to a greater extent than the guaranty.

Mr. HARDY. That would be a means whereby the Government might protect itself against overproduction by making a contract for the production of so much.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not know of any particular means of protection against an unwise guaranty.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman understands that under this bill they can make a contract for a limited amount at a given price.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; and that would protect them against the guaranty if it would keep them from making the guaranty.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Do I understand that under this bill, a war bill, a contract might be made with some one to produce pyrites at a fixed price without exercising the general power to fix a price wherever it was produced?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. They may pick out a favored one here or a favored one there?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Did the committee consider that if there was somebody producing a large amount of manganese, for instance, or sulphur, which is used for sulphuric acid the same as pyrites, that a bounty might be given to A, a good Republican or a good Democrat or a good Socialist, and all the balance of the people producing a similar thing that might be a substitute therefor would continue to produce without regard to the guaranteed price of the favored party. Can that be done under the provisions of this bill if it should be enacted?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In administering the provisions of this bill great favoritism could be shown.

Mr. CANNON. If that be true, is not the thing to do in regard to this bill to cut off its head? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARLAND. Is not that true of all the other war bills that advantage could be taken under the provisions?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I might say, in line with the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that that same thing is true of the food bill and of a great many of these bills where we have given vast powers to the Executive.

Mr. CANNON. You can include A and exclude all the other producers?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I did not know of any such provision, and I never will vote for any such provision for anybody.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The provisions for guaranty in this bill are the same as in the food bill, except that in the food bill it was limited to wheat, and here any one of these may be selected. The provision regarding the power to go out and purchase is identical with the food bill.

Mr. CANNON. That is not what I was talking about. I was talking about—take manganese, for instance; we have multiplied it 6,000 per cent in five years' production in this country, and still we do not produce, probably, two-thirds of what we need. Now, could you take some one citizen or corporation under the provisions of this bill and say, "We will pay you $5 a ton for manganese if you will produce it," and not say it to others? I can conceive that we might say we will pay $5 a ton to all producers of manganese.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The bill has that provision, but it also has the additional provision that the gentleman is criticizing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Indiana does not mean to tell the gentleman from Illinois and the House that the bill provides that the Government may in the purchase of manganese, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, discriminate between manganese producers to the hurt of any one of them? The bill has no provision that would warrant that discrimination, I take it, and I am familiar with the provisions of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield in that particular, it was stated by some gentleman on the committee in general debate that you could favor an individual miner by giving him a guaranteed price that would not extend to all the producers in the commodity. That was the purport of the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to which the gentleman from Indiana replied affirmatively.

Mr. HAMLIN. A statement was made to this effect—that in fixing the guaranteed price the Government could and would take into consideration the location of the particular mine, its proximity or distance from a market, railroad, and so forth—in other words, as to the cost of production, so that the price at the mine in one section of the country might be different at one time than another.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman is dealing with the guaranteed price. This was not what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was criticizing. I will read the portion of the bill which I have interpreted. It is on page 16, beginning with line 2, as follows:

For the purpose of making any guaranteed price effective under this section, or whenever he deems it essential, in order to protect the Government of the United States against material enhancement of its liabilities arising out of any guaranty under this section, the Secretary of the Interior with the approval of the President is authorized also, in his discretion, to purchase any of these necessaries for which a guaranteed price shall be fixed under this section, and to hold, transport, or store, or to sell, dispose of and deliver the same to any citizen of the United States or to any Government engaged in war with any country with which the Government of the United States is or may be at war, or to use the same as supplies for any department or agency of the Government of the United States.

Section 11 also authorizes the purchase of these necessaries.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In a moment. There is authority in that bill for the Secretary of the Interior to purchase any of these necessaries without any limitation as to how he shall go about the purchase of it, without any limitation as to whether he shall call for bids, or any other provision; and, as I understand it, that provision could be used to go out and purchase from A any quantity at any price the Government sees fit to pay, and refuse to purchase from B any quantity that he has and leave B out of it. That was the provision of the bill that I was referring to in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and I am not undertaking to say that that is an unwise provision. I say that if it is unwisely administered we will have disastrous results.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not in practice the very same thing that applies in making a contract to build a ship for so much, making a contract with A and not with B?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Those provisions are usually hedged about with restrictions in respect to receiving bids, and so forth.

Mr. HAMLIN. Because the gentleman has read that provision of section 14, I desire to ask if that is not the very provision that protects against the other criticism mentioned a while ago, in case there might be an overproduction of certain material?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I have never been able to understand how that provision in any way protects the Government against overproduction under a guaranty.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, yes; for the purpose of making——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Pardon me, but I have not finished. According to my belief, the only thing that will protect the Government of the United States in overproduction under a guaranty is wisdom in making the guaranty, and the only thing that will protect the public from partiality in purchase is impartiality in making the purchases.

Mr. HAMLIN. But if there should be a guaranty made and an overproduction come from it, this provision undoubtedly gives the Government the right to go and buy it and store it or ship it and sell it either to ourselves or to our allies, and in that way protect itself against this guaranty during the life of the contract.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. For the life of me, I can not see that that protects you against the guaranty. The reason the guaranty is dangerous is because if you guarantee that you will pay $10 a unit for a certain article where you need 100,000 units, and 200,000 units are produced and offered, you have to buy the additional 100,000 units, because you have guaranteed that price; and how that can protect the Government is more than I can see.

Mr. HAMLIN. The language of the bill is:

For the purpose of making any guaranteed price effective under this section, or whenever he deems it essential, in order to protect the Government of the United States against material enhancement of its liabilities arising out of any guaranty under this section, the Secretary of the Interior with the approval of the President is authorized also, in his discretion, to purchase any of these necessaries for which a guaranteed price shall be fixed under this section, and to hold, transport, or store, or to sell, dispose of, and deliver the same to any citizen of the United States or to any Government engaged in war.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The power to sell relieves.

Mr. HAMLIN. And the power to buy and store.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The power to buy does not relieve the guaranty.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, yes. If A is overproducing something on which the Government is giving a guaranty, the Government may go and buy the surplus, and if the Government has a ready market for it, all right; or it can store it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman from Missouri is talking about overproduction from the standpoint of the producer. The point I make is that if you want 100,000 units of a certain article, and in order to get them you guarantee a price of $25 per unit, and 200,000 units are produced, then you have to pay $25 per unit for the additional 100,000. The only thing that relieves from that, of course, is the ability to sell it to some other government. That is in a measure some relief.

Mr. HAMLIN. Undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In the case of production of any one of these items it will be probably either under or over production.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to inquire if it is not the fact that overproduction is hardly to be anticipated in any one of these items?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The testimony of the experts appearing before the committee was to the effect that overproduction was not dangerous, that there was not much danger of it. If the gentleman will read the hearings he will find that I asked that question of about four different witnesses who would know.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And the danger now existing of a large production of any of these items will be less six months from now or a year from now than it is now, will it not, by reason of the fact that capable miners and producers will necessarily have to devote themselves to the production of these essentials like coal and iron and many of the others, so that men will not be available for large production of any of these items?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. My notion is that the question of overproduction, if this bill be enacted, will depend upon the wisdom of its administration. If you pay $25 a unit for something that you ought not to pay more than $12 for the people producing that unit will go out and get the laborers, and you will have an overproduction, if the resources are here.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I substantially agree with the gentleman, although I do not think the matter of overproduction is one that need concern us materially.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not think so either.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, coming to the question of underproduction, that is, the quantity of this material desired for war preparations is in excess of that which is produced, if the Government guarantees the price, say the Government needs 100,000 units and guarantees the price of $25 a unit, and the commercial world outside the Government also wants 100,000 units, and there is produced 150,000 units, is it not a fact that if the Government fixes a price sufficient for its own it is sufficient to fix the price for all?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes, it does; and it has the power——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will not the fact the Government pays $25 a unit for that which it wants necessitate the commercial world to pay the same price for that which it gets?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think so.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. So the guaranteeing of price in that respect will not work injury at all, because the Government will be paying the market price?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think that might result.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It will be artificial; there is no doubt, but——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. FESS. I would like to have the attention of my friend from Minnesota. His assumption is that there was not any risk in overproduction. I notice the bill mentions five articles here, where Dr. Smith says we are producing all now that we need and three we are producing beyond our need.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. What are the three?

Mr. FESS. Sulphur is one, 105 per cent.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is a common production, like sand.

Mr. FESS. And bromine, 100 per cent; and mercury, 120 per cent, and so on.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. None of those things are dangerous. Of course, sulphur is like sand, almost; and mercury and so on are really in such small quantities that the total amount would not be large.

Mr. FESS. I think the assumption that by the Government taking them at this guaranteed price there would not be an overproduction is a violent assumption, because if the law be passed it will be an invitation that it will have the Government back of it.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will permit, take the case of sulphur, of which the gentleman speaks. Now, it is not at all possible, it is imaginary, to say we are going to put a price on sulphur and buy all sulphur.

Mr. FESS. If that is true, it is all right.

Mr. FOSTER. And I will tell the gentleman why, and why it is in this bill, in three words almost. The sulphur of the United States comes out of practically two mines. They are the greatest sulphur mines in the world, 99 per cent pure sulphur. It is controlled by a very few people. Suppose this Government gets to a place where it wants to control the price of sulphur. I understand in one sulphur mine of the United States that the par value of the stock is $100, and yet it sells for $14,000 a share. Now, if we undertook to boost the price so high the Government ought to have some right to control it.

Mr. FESS. Do you give it in this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. We do.

Mr. FESS. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. FOSTER. The same thing as to a production in the State of my colleague and myself, and that is fluorspar, which is in the hands of a very few people.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have been frankly stating to the committee the interpretation that I place upon this bill. I do not want the committee to understand because I have placed that interpretation upon the bill that I am opposed to it. I am heartily in favor of its passage, and I have endeavored to discuss the powers that it grants so that we may all know just what the legislation is that is being enacted when the bill passes, if it is not decapitated by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman from Illinois understands that on manganese, for instance, you can pay a certain man a certain price and another man another price. There is nothing like that in the bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not want to recur to that again, but I will call the gentleman's attention to the provision which I think gives that right, and that is on page 16, line 2 and thereafter, and also section 11. This gives those powers to the Government and the department. There is not any Member of the House who would be in favor of the passage of this bill in peace times; but the department which has these matters in charge, the Secretary of the Interior, and in his department the Bureau of Mines and the United States Geological Survey, which have gone over the whole situation, say that it is needful to have this legislation. I understand that when you analyze the power you grant here, and assume that that power is going to be used unwisely, that then you must concede disaster faces us. But I am willing at this time to grant those powers to the department and to depend upon the wisdom and the impartiality of the administration in carrying out the terms of the bill; but I particularly wanted the committee to know what those vast powers were, because I think that six months after this war has terminated that these unprecedented powers ought to terminate. [Applause.] I have offered this amendment to this section, which says that the duration shall be as hereinafter provided, and subsequently, when we reach section 23, I shall offer an amendment which will fix the duration six months after the war. I do not mean by that if we have taken over a plant that was idle and operate it at the end of six months we have not the right to the time necessary to complete that undertaking; and I do not mean, if we have made our guaranty two months before the termination of the war for six months, that we shall rob that man of his right under the guaranty, and the amendment I shall offer will take care of that proposition. I mean by this amendment that if we have made a guaranty 2 months before the termination of the war that shall require 22 months after the termination of the war to fulfill, then if we have done that that we shall not have to continue all the provisions of the bill for that time, but shall cut off these vast and unprecedented powers at the end of the six months after the war, leaving only such powers as are necessary to carry out that guaranty.

The provisions of the bill, as the bill reads at present, would absolutely require that all the provisions should remain in effect 22 months after the war if we made a contract two months before the termination of the war, carrying it on for two years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Section 2 confers enormous powers upon the President and the Secretary of the Interior, including the power to enter into contracts or agreements, and so forth. They might be for a term of years, I submit to the gentleman. They might not terminate within six months. How would the gentleman meet that question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If there is any provision in the bill that permits contracts running beyond the period of two years, that should be curtailed by amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the matter of the War Finance Corporation there was a limitation of 10 years, which some of us endeavored to cut to 8 years. Is there any such limitation in this bill as to the term of contract?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The subject matter is not the same. You can not make a guaranty after the war has closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the question is important and has a direct bearing on the point the gentleman is raising. I want to know if contracts made by the Secretary may be limited in their operation to the period of six months after the war.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I doubt under the provisions of the bill as now written it would be so limited.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose a contract is made to operate a certain property in the name of the Government for a period of 10 years, and the war terminates and seven and a half years of the contract remains. Does not that mean that the Government would be obliged to go on for the remainder of the time after the war?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. My opinion is that that sort of a contract would be ultra vires. But if there is any likelihood of the Government having that power it should be changed by some amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But there is no limitation now so far as the gentleman knows?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, when you come to consider any provision in this bill you ought to consider it in the light of all the provisions of the bill, and when you come to consider all the provisions of the bill you ought to do so in the light of conditions that confront you and what we desire to do and what our war necessities are. I believe I said the other day that as a general proposition I do not like legislation of this kind, and in passing I suggest that my test, by which I determine whether or not I should support a measure of this character can be measured by this rule. I am one of those who believe that private enterprise and private initiative should be left unhampered and be depended upon as long as it can meet the general public good. And only when private initiative and private enterprise fail to meet the necessities of the general public should the agencies of the general public—the Government—step in and aid or take charge.

Now, when we talk about the limitation of the powers as covered by the gentleman's amendment, let us see what he proposes to do. On page 2 he proposes to strike out, after the word "thereafter," in line 15, these words:

Only until, in the judgment of the President, the agencies and activities herein provided for can be reasonably terminated.

Now, he also inserts in lieu of that language "or such period of time as is hereinafter provided."

Then he proposes, in section 23, to strike out practically the same language as that which he strikes out on page 2.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman sees no objection to the adoption of this particular amendment, I take it?

Mr. WINGO. I am going to get to that. I am going to show my viewpoint about it. I thought in the committee that I agreed with the gentleman, and I thought he and I got what we wanted. There is not ony 2-year or 3-year or 18-month or 6-month provision in this bill. It is an absolute termination at the end of the war. The two-year provision of the bill covers length of contracts authorized by the bill.

Now, I do not believe I will violate the spirit of the proprieties by divulging the action in the committee on this proposition. When we came down to the proposition that would absolutely terminate these agencies at the end of the war we were confronted with this practical proposition that made us retain the language that is in there, namely, that you would authorize contracts not to exceed two years, and that this war may cease suddenly. You may make contracts to meet the pressing obligations of the Government in getting some of these metals for the manufacture of munitions. Three months before the war terminated you may see the necessity for making a contract that will run 11 or 12 months.

Now, I think if gentlemen will examine the provisions of the bill they will find that we have done this: That we have terminated every authority to initiate anything new after the termination of the war, and we only leave the power there to do that thing which the gentleman says he wants to do and tries to do in his amendment—wind up the affairs of this agency. Now, I think we all agree, gentlemen, that that is what we want to do. Even the gentleman will agree as to that. We do not want this to go a day longer than the emergency exists and the necessities that are to be met have been met. I think we all agree to that. None of us cares to continue this agency and this extraordinary power after the emergency and the necessity have passed away. No one wants to do that, and the committee does not. And, I reiterate, the only reason why we left that language in the bill was because we could not absolutely wipe out this power and let it cease the day peace was declared, because you would have outstanding contracts to be considered and you would have outstanding arrangements.

Then here is another thing to be considered. It does not appeal to me as it should appeal to some gentlemen who have discussed protection, and I do not care to go into that. I only mention it for purposes of illustration. These are industries where there is no question of overproduction, except one or two, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has explained why these are included in the bill—to prevent monopoly and the holding up of the Government or those having with it contracts for war supplies, it is necessary to provide with respect to those articles. It is, in the main, to meet underproduction and to save shipping in bringing these things in from other countries that this bill is presented.

If you give a man a contract on a specific price that will enable him to operate under his contract for a certain time, the effect is the same as though you paid him a bounty or gave him a protection. The effect that the Government wants to produce is, under the guaranty provision, the production of these articles which it needs. Now suppose you terminate all this by one fell stroke by the declaration of peace. These men who are engaged in this industry may not have anticipated it. The history of peace treaties in the past in the termination of wars bears out the contention that peace will come suddenly, so far as the general public is concerned. If they know that peace has been declared they will have a certain time under the proclamation to wind up the affairs of this system and they will know what to expect.

But suppose you adopted the amendment that is proposed. Everyone who goes out and undertakes to dig up these deposits and bring them in may say, when the Government agent goes to him, "I do not know on what day peace will come, and if it does come suddenly will all this be wiped out?" I think in fairness to these men who have put their money into these enterprises they should know the date when the change will come. We all dread the jar and the jolt that will come at the termination of this war, when we come back to peace basis in our industrial affairs. That is a reason why we should have a provision in this bill which will permit an easing off. If it should be less than six months it might not be sufficient. That is the reason why we do not put in "12 months" or "18 months" or "2 years."

If you read the language closely, gentlemen, you will see that we put a limit, and that is the day peace is declared, for the exercise of the initiation of the authority, and we have only left it for the President to say by his proclamation when in safety to the Government and in good faith to the men whom we have asked to go out and do this work it can be eased off. That is what we have done.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. On that point I would like to call the attention of the committee to the proviso beginning on line 22 of page 10:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize entering into contracts under this act after the termination of the war.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly. There are several provisions in there along that line.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There is but one power here that ends with the war under the terms of the bill, and that is the power to enter into any additional contract, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri. Is not that true?

Mr. WINGO. As a general proposition, yes; and I think it is a dangerous thing to tie the Government up for over two years.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That question is preliminary to the other question that I wanted to ask. Under the amendment which I read and which I intend to offer to section 23 there is a provision that "the termination of the act shall not affect the exercise of such authority and power herein granted as shall be necessary to speedily wind up the affairs of any enterprise already entered upon or to carry out any guaranty or contract made pursuant to the terms thereof and such termination." Now, so far as any obligation extends toward the person who has put his money into these mines, does not that take care of the proposition, and is not the effect of my amendment merely to protect these powers that are necessary to be retained six months after the war? If the bill is left in its present form it will continue all the power that is granted in the bill except one specific power—that of making contracts.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has covered that in his argument. I am trying to answer that very argument. I will read the gentleman's proposed amendment, and I submit that by it he will extend the authority six months longer than the present bill. Now notice the reading of the bill, and then I will read the amendment that the gentleman proposes to offer. I read:

That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect—

That is the same as the language in the bill up to that point. I read further—at the end of six months after the existing state of war between the United States and Germany and between the United States and Austria-Hungary shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President—

In the line after the word "effect" he adds "at the end of six months." Now, let us see what other language he changes. Down in lines 18, 19, and 20 he strikes out this language:

as soon as in his judgment the agencies and activities herein provided for can be reasonably terminated.

I think that is what he cuts out. He substitutes this for it:

But the termination of this act shall not affect the exercise of such authority and power herein granted as shall be necessary to speedily wind up the affairs of any enterprise already entered upon or to carry out any guaranty or contract made pursuant to the terms thereof and such termination.

What does he propose to do? You can make a contract under his amendment five months after the war is closed. Under the terms of the act you can not make any contract after the war is closed. But he says "the termination of this act shall not affect the exercise of such authority and power herein granted as shall be necessary"—to do what? To carry out any contract? No; "the affairs of any enterprise already entered upon or to carry out any guaranty or contract made pursuant to the terms thereof."

I submit that his amendment makes the terms more uncertain. We have undertaken to stop as far as we could go the authority at the termination of the war, and to give only such time as is necessary to ease off in the case of such contracts as might extend as much as nearly two years after the war, and the language in the bill is only saving language for the purpose of meeting the emergency; and the present language of the bill, I submit, is more definite and certain, and will limit the authority for the exercise of these extraordinary powers to the day that peace is declared, and then all that is done after that will be nothing more than the gentleman says—to wind up the affairs of any enterprise already entered upon or to carry out any guaranty or contract made, but it would not permit the carrying out of new enterprises.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The contract is made during the period of the war, and it may be made for a term of years?

Mr. WINGO. Not over two years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is what I was inquiring of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman will find that on page 15 of the bill, also on page 10.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the war corporation bill provision is made that the business shall not run more than 10 years, and there ought to be a limitation here. I was interrogating the gentleman to find out if there was such a provision.

Mr. WINGO. The guaranty is not to continue for more than two years, nor can contracts run longer than two years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The contract for taking over a mine——

Mr. WINGO. That would not be a contract, that would be exercising the sovereign power of the Government to meet a war necessity, and the Government would not enter into any contract for that; but if it did, by the bill the contract is limited to two years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are two ways of looking at it. The Government might suddenly dump the property back on the owner and do him great injustice, and, on the other hand, it might be that the owner of the property would say, "Well, you can not leave me now, because I have an agreement with you to continue for a term of years."

Mr. WINGO. I do not think, if the gentleman will read the act, that he can find any authority for a contract exceeding two years. I think that is a reasonable and fair interpretation of the act. We have done all we could not to have the Government do anything where private capital can do it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, we have been talking about a good many things that are not in this particular section. I wonder if we can not make some agreement as to debate on this section? I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to have five minutes, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] five minutes, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] five minutes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] five minutes, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want by unanimous consent to make a statement. It is nearly half past 1, and the time for lunch is about over.

Mr. HAMLIN. This debate will run 30 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. That is one minute for each man now present in the committee. It is nonsense to talk about as important a bill as this is to empty benches. What I do not know about this bill will make two or three books, and I want information. I want to give notice also that during the remainder of the consideration of this bill in the Committee of the Whole I shall try to keep a quorum here. Therefore I make the point, Mr. Chairman, that there is no quorum present. I do not do it for delay, but because it is a very important matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration H. R. 11529, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 256 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he handed in the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana fixing the time when the powers conferred in this bill shall terminate. It seems to me that the provisions of this first section now under consideration are inconsistent with the provisions of section 23, and that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana might well be adopted without amending section 23.

As this amendment pertains to the duration of the powers provided in this bill, I wish to speak briefly with reference to the extent of those powers. When I first examined this bill I thought some one had apparently found that there were some powers lying around loose which we had not delegated and that it was necessary to bring in a bill in order that we might give those away along with the others which we have abdicated. I should not object to this so much in war time if I knew there was a necessity and reason for it; but I have listened very carefully to this debate without being able to satisfy myself of the necessity for conveying these powers. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining, whom we all so highly respect and esteem—and this is no empty compliment, but simply an expression of the feeling of the whole House—talked for some time, but I was unable to gather definitely what it was intended to do under this bill. Other gentlemen have spoken, and even apparently under a misapprehension of the real condition of affairs. Upon examining the hearings I find that a gentleman by the name of Ingalls, editor of a mining and engineering magazine, says that, so far as most of these minerals are concerned, there is no scarcity, but that there is, on the contrary, a superfluity; that if there is any scarcity it relates to manganese, chromium, and pyrites.

I remember that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] spoke about antimony very vigorously; but I infer that antimony is quite abundant, from the fact that its price is only about half what it was in 1916, and that therefore there is no particular reason for stimulating the price of that mineral.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. The price of antimony in 1916 was $25, and in 1917, $21.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman certainly is looking in the wrong column. The official statement of the imports shows that in 1917 we imported about twice as much antimony as in 1916, but obtained it for a less price. Therefore it is now only about half the price it was then. As I remarked before, the only minerals as to which there is any scarcity are manganese, chromium ore, and pyrites, and the reason for doing something with reference to manganese is not really its scarcity after all. In looking through these hearings I do not find that any manufacturer who uses manganese has testified before the committee. No one has said that he needed any manganese to carry on his business, so far as I can ascertain. The only persons who are supporting this provision who are in any business whatever are certain mine owners who are very enthusiastic about the high price that will be paid for minerals under the provisions of this bill. They think it should be passed. Outside of that I am unable to find that anyone who is engaged in any business thinks it is necessary that this bill be adopted.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption right there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have only five minutes.

Mr. WELLING. I want to say that not a solitary mine owner appeared before the committee except one, and he opposed the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman printed in the hearings the statements of a number of mine owners who supported it, and I can readily call the attention of the committee to it if anyone cares to take up the time. On page 115 will be found a statement signed by four mine owners, who say that they "highly indorse" the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my support of this bill, such as it is, arises more from the promptings of a lively hope than from the assurances of a sound judgment. [Laughter.] The time was, many years ago, when, following the practice of the western country, I roamed the hills somewhat as a prospector. It was my lot and good or ill fortune at one time or another to engage to a considerable extent in the development of minerals, among others some of the minerals enumerated in this list of so-called necessaries. I have some knowledge of the practical conditions surrounding the discovery and development of properties of this sort, and my opinion is that the present high prices and unusual demand for these minerals will in the main lead to their development, so far as the minerals are to be found anywhere within our borders, without any Federal aid or encouragement. There may, however, be a cound reason for the encouragement of the mining of certain minerals, pyrites and manganese particularly, in this country, due to the fact that our foreign importations are large, and it is desired to utilize shipping now engaged in that trade for other purposes.

How far we are justified in placing a bonus on developments of manganese and pyrites and minerals of that character in order to relieve the demand for shipping I do not know, and it is because of that doubt rather than because of any well-grounded conviction that any real and substantial good will come out of the measure that I am proposing to support it, particularly if it is somewhat amended. It is a curious fact that no man is ever a good prospector except the fellow who prospects largely on his own account.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry, but I have not the time—and no man is a reliable expert on a mining proposition except the fellow who is compelled to submit his judgment to the acid test of actual development at a profit under private enterprise. The very fact that a man receives an official salary seems to deprive him of the spirit and the inspiration and the sound judgment necessary to make him a good prospector and a wise and dependable advisor in the matter of mineral development.

Mr. Chairman, I did not take the floor primarily for the purpose of discussing those features of the bill, but rather to call attention to the curiously illogical attitude of certain departments of this Government touching important, necessary, and essential mineral development. I think it may be said in truth that this legislation, if it is placed upon the statute books, will have become law very largely through the influence of the Secretary of the Interior, a very able and upright and wise man, a friend suggests, with all of which I agree. But the attitude of the Secretary of the Interior toward various classes of minerals is curiously illogical. While he is proposing we authorize the expenditure of $50,000,000 of the good money of the American people, invested in liberty bonds and obtained from payment of taxes, for the purpose of encouraging the development of certain minerals, the necessity for the encouragement of which is not altogether demonstrated, the Secretary of the Interior by his own acts has tremendously curtailed the development and production of mineral oil, a mineral element needed now as badly as any element produced from the earth. This very hour throughout all of the West men are prospecting the public lands, spending their time and money, enduring hardships, willing to invest their capital to develop oil, and no sooner does a prospector, a developer, a wildcatter, plant his stakes and proceed to development than the officials of the Geological Survey, under the orders and jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, proceed to withdraw the land from under the locator, thus discouraging him and preventing development. Within the last two weeks orders of withdrawal have been issued covering thousands of acres in the State I have the honor to represent on this floor. Nearly a million acres of that State, upon much of which development work would now be under way with private capital, by private enterprise, are now, and have for a considerable period of time been, held in withdrawal, making it impossible for the private individual to go on with his mineral development, except at the hazard of contesting with the same Secretary who withdrew the land his right, title, and interest in and to it. We are needing constantly increasing quantities of mineral oils for fuel, for lubrication, for power.

The reserve supplies are shortening every day. The demands are increasing every hour, and in this condition of affairs, when we are proposing to spend large sums of the people's money in the encouragement of the development of certain other minerals, the influence and activity of the Interior Department is being used in the discouragement of the development of these highly essential mineral products. Before long we shall have reported to this House a bill which, if it comes here in the form in which I understand it has been agreed upon, will add to the discouragement of oil production by further penalizing the activities of those seeking to develop the oil lands of the West.

I am hopeful that out of this bill now before us some good will come. I trust that expenditures under it may be wise. The Lord knows I hope, as all good Americans do, that we may develop our resources and become independent of all the world for these necessary minerals. I trust we are justified in spending some of the people's money for that desirable consummation. In the meantime may we not also hope that a department of the Government that is aiding, promoting, and urging this legislation shall in good conscience take its heavy hand off the oil development of the West? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, if it is not out of order, I would like to discuss the pending amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana proposes to fix the termination of the exercise of the powers conferred in this bill with reference to the termination of the war and thereby to confine the powers conferred by the bill to those powers which Congress has the right and the power to confer. If this bill has any sanction or basis of law at all, it rests upon the war powers of the Government. It is a war bill. No pretense is made by anyone that the powers conferred in the bill can rest upon any other constitutional ground. The bill provides that the governmental control of the necessaries described in it "shall continue during the war and thereafter only until, in the judgment of the President, the agencies and activities herein provided for can be reasonably terminated." The final language of this paragraph has no relation whatever to the termination of the war. It would mean exactly the same thing if it said that the powers conferred in the bill shall terminate whenever the President shall so proclaim, without any reference to the war at all. Obviously that provision, if it is effective, if it is assumed to be effective, is beyond the power of the Congress, because we can only legislate under the war power during the period in which the country is at war. It seems to me apparent that whatever may be done in section 23, which is the section which really should terminate the powers conferred in the bill, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana which refers to this paragraph ought to be adopted, because there certainly should not be two provisions in the bill, both of them seeking to put an end to the powers conferred by it.

I refer now to section 23. Whatever the committee may have meant by the language of the section, the language is unfortunate and does not, in fact, express any concrete or understandable termination of the act. It provides similarly to the section to which I have already referred:

That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect after the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President as soon as in his judgment the agencies and activities herein provided for can be reasonably terminated.

Now, we have provided in other bills that the President shall determine when this war ends. That is the determination of a fact. It can not be dependent upon when the President thinks the powers of this bill should reasonably terminate, but it must be determined as a fact and apply to all legislation which has passed to carry on the war. The President certainly can not, as this language seems to imply, find a date for the termination of the war for the purpose of this act which is different from the date found for the termination of the war as to other acts which we have passed. It seems to me clear if we are to limit our action here to the conferring of powers which we have the right to confer that we must adopt some such amendment as is proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, which will terminate the law with reference to the termination of war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana should be adopted. This bill if enacted gives very large power to those who are to apply it. It gives them immense powers; in fact, even dangerous powers. The bill itself is an emergency bill and would not be passed or thought of being passed in times of peace. Now that we are driven to the extremity where we must pass bills in order to carry on the war we should not permit anything in that bill to operate that might carry it past the necessary time that it may apply after the war, and for that very reason I think we should put in any safeguard that we may be able to put in as to the termination of the time of the bill and make it as soon after the close of the war as possible. That this bill must be passed is apparent to all; that there is in the passage of it a matter of about 400,000 tonnage that we take off and permit to be used to take men and transport food, guns, and ammunition across the ocean to carry on the war. Not alone that, but that tonnage may be cut off unless things seem to change more favorably than the newspapers now state. There is danger of us losing even the tonnage we have for that available, and if anyone has been following the newspapers for the last couple of days closely I believe they will see it is necessary for us to run some chances even in passing a bill of this sort, because these articles in here are as necessary for the operation of the war as steel, iron, cannon, or any other thing you use in war times. These are the ingredients that go into the making up of iron, steel, and these other appliances. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment. I yield back any time I may have. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, of course in five minutes I have not time to discuss this bill as I would desire to discuss it. In the first place, gentlemen, I am sure all appreciate the fact that there are only a few materials in comparison with the whole number of minerals in the country embodied in this bill. It is only an effort to give Government control of the few that are vitally needed and that are exceedingly scarce. Some gentlemen have talked this morning of the danger of overproduction, about there being no necessity to control some of the minerals because they are also being produced in this country as much or more than we now need. I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that the official statement shows, based on this last year, that there was just 10 per cent of antimony produced in this country; some 60 per cent of arsenic; 1 per cent of cerium and thorium; 8 per cent of chalk; 37 per cent of chromium; none of cobalt; corundum and emery, 83 per cent; fluorspar, 94 per cent; graphite, 25 per cent; iridium, 5 per cent; magnesite, 90 per cent; manganese, 32 per cent; mica, 38 per cent; potassium, 10 per cent; pyrites, 33 per cent; tin, 15 per cent; and tungsten, 65 per cent. Those are the official figures, and every man who knows anything about the uses of these minerals must know that they are vitally necessary in the manufacture of war materials. I stated the other day, and I am sure that is the feeling of every man here, that in normal times and under normal conditions I would not vote for this bill, and I do not believe anybody else here would; but, gentlemen, we are confronted with a very serious condition. Some of these materials that are so necessary we have heretofore got from Germany, but, of course, we would not get them now from there. It may be that a mistake has been made in the past by not encouraging the production of these minerals by a tariff. I am not going to discuss that; it does not make any difference whether that is true or whether it is not true. We must now have these minerals, and the best way that has been thought out so far is embodied in this bill. Mr. Leith, connected with the Shipping Board, tells us that the passage of this bill will enable them to release from three hundred to four hundred thousand dead-weight tons of shipping. That we need this shipping goes without saying; every man understands that. I believe when gentlemen come to study this bill carefully there will be an almost unanimous conclusion reached that the bill is necessary, that it is safeguarded, and I wish I had time to discuss other features of it, and that no possible—I think the better word would be probable—no probable discrimination or injury can come to anyone. Now, just a word in reply in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] that is now pending. I agree entirely with my colleague from Arkansas that the language of the bill makes the termination of the great powers conferred by the bill shorter than it would be in case the gentleman's amendment should be adopted.

The gentleman's amendment provides for the continuation of the operations under contracts that the Government may be under at the time the war terminates. Now, the bill provides specifically, gentlemen, that no operation under this bill can be carried on a moment after the President issues a proclamation declaring peace. The only thing that can be continued under this bill is the carrying out of some agreement that may have been entered into under the bill before the termination of the war. And no contract can be entered into under this bill by the Government to extend over a period of two years. So that I can conceive, as my friend from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] suggested, that in 3 months, or 2 months, or 30 days, perhaps, before the war terminated, none of us being able to see the result that far ahead, might enter into an agreement to guarantee minimum prices on certain things and the war suddenly comes to an end. The Government should have time to close up its contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have about five minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have his time extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for the termination of debate has been fixed by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have five minutes more time.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois was insistent on limiting the time, and I think he ought to object if nobody else does.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think inasmuch as the agreement was made I ought to stand by it.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven Members are present, a quorum.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. GARLAND. Will the Chair have the amendment again reported so that gentlemen who have come in may hear it?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President is authorized through the Secretary of the Interior to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, is authorized to enter into any voluntary arrangements or agreements; to use any agency or agencies; to accept the services of any persons without compensation; to cooperate with any agency or person; and to coordinate their activities so as to avoid any preventable loss or duplication of effort or funds. Any person may be employed under the provisions of this act without reference to civil-service laws and regulations.

Mr. ROBBINS, Mr. McKENZIE, and Mr. MILLER of Minnesota rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] is recognized.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I had intended to discuss this question, but I see in the room now the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], and, as this is a war measure, he has a little matter that I think will be very interesting, and so I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] for two or three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] will be recognized for three minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, as the Chair says, this will have to be read by unanimous consent. This poem was written by Capt. Rainsford as a marching song for his regiment, the Three hundred and seventh United States Infantry, National Army, which was stationed during the winter at Camp Upton. In its ranks are many Irishmen, and its commissioned officers carry blackthorn sticks. It is called "Faugh-a-Ballagh," which is Irish for "Clear the way."

This poem has all the swing of Kipling in it. I was reading it a few moments ago to some friends in the cloakroom, and it was suggested that it ought to go into the RECORD. It appeared in the last issue of the Outlook.

FAUGH-A-BALLAGH.

[By W. Karr Rainsford, captain, Three hundred and seventh United States Infantry, National Army.]

There's a Blackthorn Regiment belongs to Uncle Sam,
And it's heading out for trouble any day.
Be it France, or Greece, or Russia, it doesn't give a damn,
Only start it on its road and clear the way!

So clear the way before us when our marching orders come!
Can't you hear the fifes ascreaming and the throbbing of the drum,
And the roar of marching feet
Down the crowded city street,
Past the avenues of faces? It's the long good-by for some.
It's the price we gladly pay
To the Resurrection Day.
Let us pay it as we play it—Faugh-a-Ballagh! Clear the way!

We have never faced a barrage, and we've never shed our blood,
Though we've done our duty decent up to date,
But we're strong on stumps and snow fields, we're hyenas for the mud,
We'll be ready when we hear their hymn of hate.

We've a debt that's due to England. We've a price to give for France,
We've a score with God Almighty we would pay.
We have talked and we have dallied while the others staked our chance,
It is time we drew our cards—so clear the way!

There's a length of battered trenches where the trees are torn and dead,
With the reek of rotting horses in the air;
Where through the blinding fog the shells come wailing overhead,
And it's waiting for us now over there.

Where the yellow mud is spattered from the craters in the snow,
Where the dice of death are loaded—let us play.
We have pledged our word to Freedom, and it's there that we would go,
With the strength that Freedom gives us—clear the way!

Clear the way to No Man's Land, with bugles shrill and high,
Clear it to the lid of hell, with flags against the sky.
Clear the way to Kingdom Come, and give us glad good-by,
We've a blow to strike for Freedom—clear the way!

[Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 3, line 6, after the word "funds," strike out the balance of the paragraph, which words to be stricken out are as follows: "any person may be employed under the provisions of this act without reference to civil-service laws and regulations."

Mr. ROBBINS. Gentlemen of the committee, this provision is intended in the existing bill to strike down the civil-service examinations for these employees under this bill. It is unnecessary and it is unfair to do this.

I want to read to you, gentlemen of the committee, from the last report of the Civil Service Commission, on page 8, to show that there is already a provision in the general civil-service law of January 16, 1883 (22 Stats., 403), that exactly covers and applies to this situation. It says:

An Executive order was issued on March 26, 1917, permitting the commission, when it decides that because of the public exigency there is need of the immediate filling of a position for which there is no suitable eligible, to authorize the filling of such position by the appointment of a person shown to be qualified by such noncompetitive tests of fitness as the commission may prescribe. Up to October 1, 1917, 263 appointments had been authorized under this order, the appointee in each case being first required to file evidence of qualifications. By an Executive order of May 11, 1917, the commission was authorized in its discretion to approve appointments without examination of civilian employees attached to military organizations sent to Europe. Under this order 213 appointments were approved up to October 1, 1917. The commission is authorized under section 10 of Civil Service Rule II to permit appointment on noncompetitive tests of fitness to a vacancy in a position the compensation or duties of which are such that in its judgment qualified persons are so rare that it can not in the interest of good civil-service administration be filled at that time through open competitive examination. The number of appointments under this order during the fiscal year was 48. Many of these appointments were of persons with special experience or training who were willing for patriotic motives to serve the Government at a merely nominal compensation.

Now, there is only one reason why this committee should seek to make all of the employees under this bill of a class that are exempt from the civil-service requirements, and that is this, that technical knowledge is required as to the duties that these men are to discharge, especially in the educational qualifications that they must possess in order to meet the requirements of this act. And the rule which I have read, which is a standing rule of the Civil Service Commission, covers exactly employees or Government servants in that class. Therefore there can be no occasion for the exempting of this vast number of employees to be taken into the Government service under the provisions of this bill.

Why, gentlemen, we are brought to our senses here by the testimony taken by the committee in the hearings on this bill of the very large number of new employees which these Government departments have taken on during the last year. Mark this, and I read from Dr. Manning's testimony, on page 58 of the hearings. When asked about the Bureau of Mines, he said this:

The Bureau of Mines has increased its personnel from 470 men this time last year to about 1,700 men now.

The Bureau of Mines, of course, will have very largely to do with the examinations of mineral lands and mines that are to be conducted under this act. This bill is to create under section 17, that proposes an appropriation of $500,000 for the investigations and search for these minerals, to employ a corps of men who are to go about over this country seeking these necessities or these secondary minerals, as they are called in the act. The number of that corps of men will be limited and their qualifications determined only by the ability of the Secretary of the Interior, who alone selects them. There will be an army of them, and they are to be all placed "outside of the civil service," with no mental requirements except what the Secretary says are to be adopted as a standard of capacity from which they are to be selected. He is to name them without any restriction if this provision is allowed to remain in the bill.

But that is not the most vicious part of this proposition. This is a deliberate attempt, intentional or unintentional, insidious as it may seem, innocent as it appears upon its face, to strike down the Civil Service Commission of the United States, a commission, gentlemen of the committee, that this month in the performance of its duties examined in Washington alone between April 15 and April 20, 3,187 persons for public service in the Government departments, and outside of Washington fully as many more. And last year, with all the great drafts upon it by the various departments, it examined in Washington 175,284—and I read from the last report, page 21, from which 79,268 persons were selected for the classified service and given employment, and outside of Washington 36,830, from which 7,044 were selected and placed in the classified service, or a total—mark the stupendous work that this commission is performing and is preparing to perform—a total of 212,214 persons were examined, out of which were selected and inducted into the Government service and qualified service 86,312. This, gentlemen, is intended as a death blow to the Civil Service Commission and to the civil-service law, and I am opposed to all such legislation. I hope that this amendment will be adopted and that all these employees to be engaged to perform service under this bill will be preserved within the civil-service law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] is entirely mistaken in his impression with reference to this provision. It is true that Mr. Manning did testify that this bureau had expanded from 470 to 1,700 men. But probably he did not tell the complete story—I mean Dr. Manning—so that the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not, probably, understand it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does the gentleman mean to say that I did not read the exact language from Dr. Manning on page 58?

Mr. FOSTER. He did not read enough.

Mr. ROBBINS. I did not read all of his statement.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman might have that impression by reading what he did. But here are the facts: The 470 men were employees of the bureau. Now, as it is well known to nearly everybody, the Bureau of Mines has taken on a large amount of the work of the War Department in reference to war work, as to gases and such work connected therewith. Now, those men are not all taken in under the civil service. They are taken in under the war appropriation act, and many of them are enlisted men. Many of them are expert chemists and men of that kind, who are not under the civil service. There may be a few of them who are. So that disposes of that part of it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, may I make an inquiry of the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman states that the Bureau of Mines has taken over a large part of the work in regard to the production and handling of gas in the Army. Can the gentleman state, without going into too much detail, how large a part of the gas service is in the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. FOSTER. This Bureau of Mines is doing most of it. There are Army officers there.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think the gentleman is mistaken. Have they not an independent bureau in the War Department working on that?

Mr. FOSTER. They may have them together.

Mr. WELLING. May I read just what Dr. Manning says, following what was read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. He says:

The Bureau of Mines has increased its personnel from 470 men this time last year to about 1,700 men now. Of course, these are new departures; the War Department had not undertaken any of this work before. The character of this work is confidential.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is all right; but if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. FOSTER. That is where a large number of those men are located.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman permit a question right there, so as to be perfectly fair?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. If you will read the civil-service examination, they say under that position of military appointees for confidential work in the testing of gas or military work of that kind, under this provision 213 were appointed, not all of the 1,700.

Mr. FOSTER. I said that some of them were civil-service employees, a small part.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says this is an effort to strike down the civil service. Is it not true that the Civil Service Commission has joined in a request to the President to remove all war work in the Bureau of Mines from the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. And I will say this further to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that they did make a request, as told by the gentleman from Michigan—made the request as to explosives. They joined in the request—the Civil Service Commission—that these men should, as far as possible, be selected outside of the Civil Service Commission. Now, as a result of what that explosives section did, I want to read to you what Dr. Manning said in reply to a question by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman permit me right there? I called up the Civil Service Commission this morning and asked them about this matter, and they said they could provide all the employees needed under this bill, and that the civil-service standards ought to be preserved.

Mr. FOSTER. They came under the explosives bill, but they joined in a request to the President to place them outside of the civil service. There is no controversy between the gentleman and myself about that.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Is there anything confidential in the personnel under this bill? There is no reason why they should be confidential?

Mr. FOSTER. No; none on earth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may have five minutes more. I interrupted him myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois let me ask him a question?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. You know this is a year in which our side of the House is for the Civil Service Commission. [Laughter.] Is it possible for the Civil Service Commission under this bill to furnish these employees that will satisfy a man like me?

Mr. FOSTER. I will answer the gentleman. In answer to the question on this very point by Mr. JAMES, when Mr. JAMES said——

Mr. ROBBINS. Where does the gentleman read from?

Mr. FOSTER. From the testimony. I read the following:

Mr. JAMES. When the powder bill was up you remember this language, "accept the services of any person without compensation," and then a little further, "any person may be employed under the provisions of this act without reference to civil-service laws and regulations." I believe in civil service. At that time you stated it was not the intention of giving Democrats or anybody else a job, but simply to take care of a good many men who wouldn't want to take the civil-service examination whatever. You wanted to use them without getting their services for nothing, and at the same time you want to take care of that.

Dr. MANNING. I will give you a concrete illustration of that. In the explosion at Jersey City, instead of our bureau sending an expert over there, Mr. Topping, who was Director of the Bureau of Explosives, a bureau that is organized and financed by the railroads of the country, went there. He is getting a dollar a year. He made a prompt report to the Bureau of Mines as to the causes of that explosion. We had to give him a dollar a year so as to give him entrée to the manufactories and all plants where explosions occur.

He further said he sent that telegram to Mr. Topping, and in a short time he had word back as to the cause of that explosion. That is one reason why we could not ask a man like that to take a civil-service examination.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman knows that I have confidence in the gentleman. Does the gentleman feel that he has given me a reason in that one illustration?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Let me say to my friend this: These men are necessarily expert in that line of work, and ought to be.

Mr. JAMES. Under the powder bill we are using county clerks and village clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. They donate their services. We would not want them to take the civil-service examination.

Mr. FOSTER. And the mine inspectors.

Mr. JAMES. They would not want to take the civil-service examination.

Mr. FOSTER. We are using the county clerks, and, as the gentleman from Michigan says, we would not want them to take the civil-service examination.

Mr. BUTLER. No; and I would not either; but at the same time——

Mr. FOSTER. Some of those now connected with the bureau are under the civil-service law, and yet the director was not compelled to put any of them under that law. But he did it, and he put every one under the law that it was possible for him to put under it. The employees who do the clerical work are under the civil service now.

Mr. BUTLER. How about the clerical force hereafter?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know what the gentleman means.

Mr. BUTLER. They will have to increase the clerical force under this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Those clerks will be appointed without reference to the civil service.

Mr. FOSTER. They could be, but I doubt if they will be.

Mr. BUTLER. Could we not write it into the bill, so that there would be no doubt about it.

Mr. FOSTER. We passed the explosives bill in the House with this very provision. It went to the Senate and the Senate cut it out. Then it went to the President, and he signed it; and after he had signed it and it had become a law, then the Civil Service Commission joined in a letter to the President asking him to remove these employees from the civil service on account of the peculiar work and its temporary character.

Mr. BUTLER. Under the law the President has the authority to designate certain men who may be employed under this bill without taking the civil-service examination. He has that authority now. Could we not write it in here so that it would specify, so as to satisfy the ordinary man as he runs along, that all the great clerical force should be employed under the civil service?

Mr. FOSTER. I care nothing about the clerical force. The men I am speaking about are this expert force who go out, and the men whom they might desire for consultation, who would be willing to do this work without compensation. There was Mr. Topping, whom they put on the roll at a dollar a year to do certain work without expense to the Government.

Mr. HAMLIN. There are certain technical gentlemen who ought not to be put under the civil service.

Mr. BUTLER. They ought not to be examined at this time, I admit, and they need not be.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is the State geologist of Illinois and the State geologist of Missouri, and there are one or two other eminent gentlemen who have been here helping the Bureau of Mines, and will doubtless continue to do so. These gentlemen would not want to take the civil-service examination.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They are not employed by the Government, but by the State.

Mr. HAMLIN. They get a dollar a year, or something like that, from the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. There is Dr. Richards, from the gentleman's own State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. GILLETT. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. I submit to the gentleman in all fairness that rule 2, section 10, as promulgated by the Civil Service Commission, would cover the very class of cases he is speaking of, where the President, in his judgment, thinks the qualifications of the persons are so rare that it is to the interest and good of the public service that they be taken out of the operation of the law. Does not the gentleman think that would cover every man who would be sent out to search for these necessary minerals under this geological expedition?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so. The gentleman has asked me a question. Let me ask this one: Does the gentleman think it would be right to take Dr. Richards, of Lehigh University, and say to him, "Now, we would like to have your services, but we want you to fill out one of these blanks of the Civil Service Commission"?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will answer the gentleman's question——

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman can answer it yes or no.

Mr. ROBBINS. I will say no, that we do not wish him to fill out a blank; but I will say that the selection of a man like Dr. Richards is covered by this rule 2, section 10, now in existence, promulgated by the Civil Service Commission. I would not want to ask Dr. Richards to take an examination, but would require an application to disclose the facts necessary to such appointment.

Mr. FOSTER. He would belong to what they call the nonassembled type. They send out and grade a man, whether he is qualified. I would not want to ask Dr. Richards to do that. He is too high class a man.

Mr. BUTLER. I would not want to do that; but would it be necessary?

Mr. FOSTER. No; but he could not get in under the existing law if you strike that out.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I can see some reason why it is not desirable that these technical and scientific men should be selected with any reference to the Civil Service Commission. It is a rather cumbersome method to go to the Civil Service Commission and say, "Here are some men whom we would like to get," and have the Civil Service Commission inspect them and go into all those details. That would be aggravating. On the other hand, I do not like the idea of leaving this wide open, and I ask the gentleman if he would have any objection to this amendment, after the word "employed," in line 6, to insert the words "for technical or scientific work," so that it would read:

Any person may be employed for technical or scientific work under the provisions of this act without reference to the civil-service law.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that. This is not an attempt to break down the civil service. I will ask the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield the floor to the gentleman from Minnesota to offer the amendment?

Mr. FOSTER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I offer a preferential motion to perfect the text; after the word "employed," in line 6, insert the words "for technical or scientific work."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I have listened to what the gentleman from Illinois has said. I do not think he at all answered the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The fact is that in almost every bill brought up which has granted this enormous increase of force to the administration there has been this clause excepting the appointment from the operation of the civil-service law. The reason for that, in my opinion, is only that deserving Democrats may be appointed. That is my conviction of the purpose, and I believe that is the result. There is no need, and anybody who carefully inspects it will see that there is no need, for such a provision as this simply to protect a few exceptional appointments to which the gentleman from Illinois refers. The gentleman from Pennsylvania read the clause of the civil-service act which of itself protects them pretty well. But we have a further protection than that, because if it is necessary in order to procure the proper men that they shall be excepted from the civil-service law, the President of the United States by the law is given the power to except them. It is given for that very purpose. The reason the civil-service law was established was not because in all cases it ought to apply, but because in the majority of cases it ought to apply to prevent partisan appointments. It is applicable to us when in power as to you when in power. That is the purpose of it, and because in some cases it would be unwise and unduly restrictive, as the gentleman from Illinois suggests, the President was given absolute power, whenever he saw fit, to exempt from it a class or an individual. So in this case, if there are men who need to be exempted, all the President has to do is to sign the order. Therefore, in my opinion, all these exemptions have been put in order to allow partisan appointments. I can not see any other reason for it.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the gentleman think that men like Dr. Richards and others would be appointed for partisan purposes?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think that everybody is appointed for partisan purposes. You have got to have some good men. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. And you can get them outside of the civil service.

Mr. GILLETT. Outside the Democratic Party, and the President can exempt them from the civil service.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman knows that the President has appointed quite a number of Republicans.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know that he has.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman know that in the food bill we had the same provision that the clerks should be selected outside the civil service?

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we did not have such a provision in the food bill. The President issued an order under which the Food Administration has taken its employees without reference to the civil service.

Mr. GILLETT. That seems to contradict the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Hoover informs me that he selected his employees from the civil service.

Mr. GILLETT. I have great regard for Mr. Hoover, and I do not believe that Mr. Hoover is actuated much by partisan purposes. He is looking for good men and not good Democrats.

The purpose, as I believe—I hope that I am mistaken, but I do not believe I am—the purpose of the clause in these bills is in order to allow patronage appointments. And I think it is particularly unfair when such enormous powers and patronage have been given to the President by both sides that they should always take pains to exempt them from the civil service. So that the appointments will only represent one side. The Federal reserve bank was the first law I remember that contained this exception, and then right down through all these additional departments and bureaus which have been created, every one of them, as I remember, has a clause that the civil-service rules shall not apply.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota is adopted, except those falling under the amendment, all the other employees would come under the civil service.

Mr. GILLETT. If his amendment is adopted?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. GILLETT. Frankly, I do not think that is much better than it is now, although it is somewhat of an improvement. The committee did not put it in, they had to wait for the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is all right as it is, but I have no objection to it.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-four Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair amid prolonged applause; Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 11259 and finding itself without quorum, he directed the roll to be called, whereupon 238 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he handed in the list of absentees for printing in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I am glad that you indorse the action I took about whether I should stay here or go to the Senate. [Applause.] Of course, to be a Senator from Missouri is a great honor. No State in the Union has ever had a higher average of senatorial ability than that displayed by the double line of Senators from Missouri. Several of them were great men, all of them were good men, and only one or two of them could by any possibility be considered small men. The tender of the Senatorship by Gov. Gardner presented to me the most serious question that has ever arisen in my life from a political standpoint. The enormous amount of solicitation that I received from Missouri, which I love so well, compelled me in the very nature of things to consider it, and to consider it thoroughly, because the offer of a Senatorship from that imperial Commonwealth could not be regarded lightly by any of her sons. The generous conduct of the Republicans in the House would have made it easier for me to take the Senatorship than if they had not so acted, and I want publicly to thank them not only for suspending the rules, at the request of Mr. GILLETT, to permit me to attend Senator STONE's funeral, but also for the tender they made yesterday morning as to the Speakership.

I gave the matter consideration for two days and nights. I left out of it as far as was humanly possible my own political fortunes. The only question in my mind was where lay my duty to my country. [Applause.] Duty is the sublimest word in our vernacular, and I am proud to say that every Member of this House is a patriot according to his lights and is honestly striving to discharge his full duty to his country. In this exigency of our affairs—indeed, of the affairs of the whole world—it is the supreme duty of every citizen to do everything he can to uphold the hands of the administration and the glory of his country, and he ought to be in the place where he can do the most good. That was what I had to consider. I finally decided that on account of the affection and esteem so often manifested to me by the entire House of Representatives, without a man missing, Democrats, Republicans, and Independents, my duty is here. There is a House habit and a Senate habit, very different in their nature and character. I am thoroughly saturated with the House habit. I might become so thoroughly ingrained with the Senate habit. As far as the personal phase of it is concerned, this has been the scene of my great activities for a quarter of a century. Here I have experienced both defeats and victories. Service in this House does not always give you victory. You have to accept the fortunes of war. Whatever reputation I have in the world I achieved on the floor of the House of Representatives, and if I were to live a million years the manifestation of esteem and affection of this House bestowed on me so often would not be forgotten. They are enshrined in my heart forever. So I made up my mind to stay with you, and we will all fight this war out together—to victory, I hope and believe. [Prolonged applause.]

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. BARKLEY, the following telegram from the governor of Missouri tendering the Speaker the Senatorship and a copy of the Speaker's reply thereto are inserted at this point:

JEFFERSON CITY, MO., April 24, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Congress Hall, Washington, D. C.:

I have the honor of tendering to you the appointment as Senator to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator STONE. I hope to hear early advice of your acceptance.

FREDERICK D. GARDNER.

SPEAKER CLARK'S LETTER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 26, 1918.

Hon. FREDERICK D. GARDNER,
Jefferson City, Mo.

MY DEAR GOV. GARDNER: I am profoundly grateful for your tender of the Senatorship, for your good opinion thus evidenced is highly prized by me. To be a Senator from the imperial Commonwealth of Missouri is a signal honor. No State in the Union has furnished the country a line of Senators of higher average ability than has Missouri. Therefore a Senatorship at her hands is a position not to be declined lightly by any man.

The duty of selecting from a multitude of able men a worthy successor to the great Senator STONE placed you in a serious situation and your offer to me put me in a serious position. I have thoroughly considered my duty in the premises, leaving out of the consideration my own personal fortunes as far as was humanly possible, and have come to this conclusion:

In this awful crisis of our country's affairs—indeed, of the whole world's affairs—it is the imperative duty of every man to serve the people and uphold the Government to the best of his ability and in the position where he can do the most good. I believe that I can render more service in the Speaker's chair than in the Senate. Therefore I feel constrained to decline your tender of the Senatorship, heartily thanking you and the many Missourians who have urged me to accept.

CHAMP CLARK.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that. I would like to say a word in opposition to this proposed amendment after the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is through.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not remember exactly what I was discussing when I was taken off my feet by the roll call and it is rather hard to turn from the most interesting remarks of the Speaker of this House to the discussion of this bill, but it may not be improper for me just to say that I have such a regard and esteem and affection for the Speaker that for one I am delighted that he has decided to stay with us [applause], and I am sure all of us on this side give full credit and admiration to the patriotic motives which we believe determined his choice and are very glad that he is not going to desert us. [Applause.]

Now, turning, Mr. Chairman, to the somewhat partisan matter which is rather out of line with those remarks, I do not see any reason at all for the clause which exempts the employees from civil service except one, and that is that they can be appointed for partisan-patronage purposes. Except for that one purpose there is no reason at all that this clause should be in there because, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania said, the rule now adopted by the Civil Service Commission exactly provides for those cases and allows exemptions to be made for the very class of men that the chairman of the committee says it is intended to exclude; and for all the rest, the clerks, they ought to be under the civil service. Now, I do not suppose that every official appoints men simply for patronage purposes. I do not believe that even if this amendment is defeated every man who was appointed would be a deserving Democrat. Some officials undoubtedly will prefer to have an efficient force rather than to please Congressmen or political bosses; but the only reason for this clause in the bill is to allow patronage, to allow men to be appointed simply because they are deserving Democrats, because the Civil Service Commission can provide for all places that are necessary, and, moreover, the President has absolutely the power to exempt a class or person. Now, formerly, I did not believe that specialists, chemists, scientific men, could be well selected by civil-service examinations, although I have always sincerely believed in the principle, but little by little experience has shown that there are very few classes of employees, no matter how great their technical skill, who can not be selected by examinations provided by the Civil Service Commission, and the experience we have gone through shows that the men who are being employed under this law might better be selected by the civil-service law.

So there is but one reason; and, as I say, I think the exceptions which have been made in law after law can have had only one purpose, and that is the purpose of reverting back to the old spoils practice, and no longer have merit instead of partisanship determine appointment to office. Therefore, in this time of war it is peculiarly ungenerous, it seems to me, as well as unwise to put in this bill a clause which will allow employees to be appointed for partisan reasons. The amendment which my friend from Minnesota has offered in a certain measure is better, of course, than the original bill, but I do not believe even that is necessary. I believe the Civil Service Commission and the President together can absolutely prevent any harm which the gentleman from Illinois portends if we strike out that provision, and therefore it seems to me the whole clause ought to be stricken out and let these new appointments be made under the general law.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to close debate on this. I am not making any fight. I thought the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota would cure all objection anybody had to that.

Mr. FESS. I would like some time.

Mr. FOSTER. How much time would the gentleman like? I would like to close it up.

Mr. FESS. I would like five minutes. I had hoped to have 10 minutes, but I will take 5 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman give me two minutes?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman has had time.

Mr. ROBBINS. But so much of my time was taken up by questions; the gentleman took up half my time asking questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of seven minutes?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have not used any time at all——

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my request.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And if the gentleman from Pennsylvania has time, I would like some.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not care for time; I will not bother with it, and I withdraw my request for time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania when he discussed his amendment that this assault on the merit system proposed as a part of this legislation was the beginning of the breakdown of the civil service. Had he but reviewed legislation since the Democrats took control of the Government, he would not have been so mild in his statement. I would like to call the attention of my friend to the fact that the first law of this administration of which I have any note that began the assault upon the merit system which definitely points to the breakdown of the civil service was June 20, 1913, referring to the Supervising Architect's Office, which exempted from the classified service employees in connection with plans, specifications, and construction of the central heating plant. The second one was October 3, 1913, the famous Underwood bill, in which the agents, deputy collectors, inspectors, and employees of the Government to be employed in the income-tax law were exempted by legislative act of this Congress. A third law was enacted October 22, 1913, only three weeks later, which provided for an army of deputy collectors and internal-revenue officers and deputy marshals, and broke the shield of protection of the merit system by opening up the crib for the hungry spoilsmen. December 23, 1913, another loudly heralded Democratic measure was made law, and provided through another assault upon the merit system that the employees in the Federal reserve act were exempt from the operation of the civil-service regulations by a specific clause in the Federal reserve law. Mr. Chairman, this law was the fourth measure, being all the measures of consequence in 1913 which made special exceptions to the civil-service regulations. Half of them were leading administration measures, upon which the Democrats were willing to stand before the country. Two were made riders to appropriation bills, which indicates the hunger of the spoilsmen now in control of the country. July 16, 1914, another law was enacted, which exempted the commercial attachés of the Department of Labor from the operations of the merit system. This was another rider attached to an appropriation bill. On August 1, 1914, the commissioner of immigration's office, New Orleans, also was exempted from the operations of the law; also on the same date the Five Civilized Indian Tribes were exempted by a rider to an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. FESS. I am quite aware that our Democratic friends do not care to hear a recital of these acts. But they are the list of which this assault is but one, and I have no doubt that many others are to come.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will pause for a moment, in order to enable the Chair to secure order, so that his recital may be heard.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Chairman. September 26, 1914, another of the President's program of legislation was made law—the Federal Interstate Trade Commission—which exempted the clerks and the various appointees under that law from the merit system and opened them to the hungry horde. This was the fourth assault in 1914, the second year of Democratic rule. January 28, 1915, the Life-Saving Service was exempted from the operations of the law.

I think that that probably is justified. Therefore I am not making any opposition to that. I am frank to admit that I am not averse to exercising personal selection where special discipline must be had. For that reason I am not insistent the civil-service regulations must be observed in all military or naval appointments. However, I would not allow them to be prostituted as spoils.

The rural credits bill exempted the appointees from the operations of the merit law, and it slipped in another provision that will indicate the tendency of the legislation during this Democratic administration. I want it noted. I quote the provision:

> Also such attorneys, experts, assistants, clerks, laborers, and other employees and all registrars, examiners, and appraisers shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of the act of January 16, 1883, and amendments thereto or any rule or regulation made in pursuance thereof.

That is the general provision. Now note this language with special attention to the dominant emphasis of the party now in power to seize and hold the offices:

> Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the President from placing said employees in the classified service.

That is a wonderfully suggestive feature of the law. You repeal the civil-service law in order to get the spoils seekers in, and then you cover them into the civil service after you have gotten them in, so that they can not be gotten out. Now, that is the law. For the first two years assaults got no further than removing the barriers against Democratic preferment upon the claim that "I won the place and I demand it as a victor." These assaults became so common that they were regarded the rule of Democratic legislation. The third year began the effort to cover the victors with Executive favor.

The same thing in the Shipping Board; the same general rule will be observed in nearly all the laws that we have passed in 1916 and 1917. It is not necessary to enumerate them. I have been sufficiently specific to establish the policy of the Democratic administration since 1913, its first year of control; and so when my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] suggests that this proposed law now before us is the beginning of the breakdown of the civil service, I wanted to simply call his attention to the fact that it is pretty nearly the end of the breakdown of the civil service. If there is any real assurance to the public that the merit system has any friend in the party in power it does not occur in legislation, but quite the contrary.

Gentlemen, I am really intent in my sympathy for the maintenance of the civil service in its real meaning, and my opposition is to these repeated assaults which augur no good but much harm to the public service; and while I do not care at this time to make statements that would indicate a partisan spirit, I can not refrain from calling attention to the evident and conclusive purposes of these onslaughts on the civil service as this law here makes.

One of the most indefensible practices of the genuine spoilsmen is to persist in a belief in the merit system as a political theory, but urge its abandonment in practice as it applies to technical or expert skill. I am somewhat in sympathy with the idea that for a certain kind of skill a personal selection might be better than by competitive examination. But in practice this exception is abused and is apt to be employed as an open door to invite the spoilsman into his own on the claim of expert ability. This is on a par with the vicious practice of recommending the three highest in order that partisan preferment can be practiced without an open violation of the letter of the law, when we all know it is a violation of its spirit.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment which seeks to preserve the merit system. If the bill as written—which is but a copy of all major legislation of the Democratic Party on this practice, notwithstanding their promise in platform and forum—is not amended, it will be but another bludgeon hurled against our efforts to establish and maintain a high degree of public service through the merit system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] has moved to strike out certain language in the bill. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] moves to amend the language proposed to be stricken out. That is a preferential motion and will be voted on first.

Mr. ROBBINS. May we have the language repeated again?

The CHAIRMAN. The language proposed to be stricken out or the language as proposed to be amended?

Mr. ROBBINS. The whole matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 3, line 6, after the word "funds," strike out the balance of the paragraph, which reads as follows:
> "Any person may be employed under the provisions of this act without reference to civil-service laws and regulations."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER of Minnesota: Page 3, line 6, after the word "employed," insert: "For technical or scientific work," so that the sentence as amended will read as follows:
> "Any person may be employed for technical or scientific work under the provisions of this act without reference to civil-service laws and regulations."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the perfecting amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. GILLETT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT. As I understand it, this amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota perfects not, of course, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS], but perfects the text of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It perfects the text of the bill.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] to strike out the sentence referred to.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That no person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall solicit, induce, or attempt to induce, any person or officer authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts on behalf of the United States, to make any contract or give any order for the furnishing to the United States of any necessaries or other property covered by the provisions of this act, if such agent or employee has any pecuniary interest in such contract or order, or if he or any firm of which he is a member, or corporation, joint-stock company, or association of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in the pecuniary profits of which he is directly or indirectly interested, shall be a party thereto. Nor shall any such agent or employee make, or permit any committee or other body of which he is a member to make, or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States, or to any member or subordinate thereof, without making to the best of his knowledge and belief a full and complete disclosure in writing to such council, board, commission, or subordinate of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and of his interest in any firm, corporation, company, or association being a party thereto. Nor shall he participate in the awarding of such contract or giving such order. Any willful violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not change, alter, or repeal section 41 of chapter 321, Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large.

Any agent or employee of the United States who, contrary to the provisions of this section, shall receive any profit or profits from any contract for necessaries made under the provisions of this act, or any firm of which such agent or employee is a member or any corporation, joint-stock company, or association of which such agent or employee is an officer or stockholder or in the pecuniary profits of which he is directly or indirectly interested, which, contrary to the provision of this section, shall receive any profits from any contract for necessaries or for other property taken for the purpose of obtaining necessaries under the provisions of this act, shall forfeit to the United States all such profits and the same may be recovered by the United States in any appropriate action at law or equity in any proper district court any time within five years after fact of such interest shall be discovered.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], the chairman of the committee, state what this section of the Statutes at Large is that is not repealed by the provision?

Mr. FOSTER. I will leave that to the lawyers. They know more about that than I do.

Mr. WALSH. I do not quite remember what section 41 is. I have a dim idea of what section 40 might be.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is the general provision of the Criminal Code forbidding a Government agent dealing with anything in which he has an interest.

Mr. WALSH. If that is the statute, would not it apply to officers, agents, and employees, or members or employees of any board created under this act?

Mr. ANDERSON. If I remember correctly, the section of the Statutes at Large referred to is limited to officers and employees, while there will be under this law, I take it, advisory boards and others who are not acting in the capacities to which the particular provision referred to is limited.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; there certainly will be advisory boards under this act, and lots of other kinds of members.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I observed in this morning's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mr. Chairman, in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN] on yesterday, on page 5636, he has inserted a statement obtained from The Adjutant General of the Army, showing 60,357 commissioned officers in the various corps of the Army, of which less than 4,200 are in the District of Columbia. Of these 4,200 employees, 3,100 are in three bureaus, the Ordnance, the Signal Corps, and the Medical Corps; those in the Medical Corps, of course, all being doctors; that is, 90 per cent of them are physicians.

This insertion in the RECORD rather refutes the various newspaper statements and statements on the floor of the House here and at the other end of the Capitol that the town is crowded with reserve commissioned officers. I took it upon myself to make an investigation, purely to learn if a lot of these fellows are deserving of being called "bomb-proof officers," "slackers," "slickers," and other characterizations that really are not deserved from my point of view, and I am satisfied that the House will agree with me after hearing my observations.

In the Bureau of Ordnance they have the procurement division. The procurement division will probably spend $4,000,000,000 this year. Think of it! A new division, unheard of a short time ago, will expend $4,000,000,000 this year. Now, is it not perfectly natural that the War Department will want the very highest type of men for commissions in that division?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. KEATING. Does the gentleman feel that the very highest type of men for that particular kind of work may be found within the draft age?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I do not.

Mr. KEATING. That is the objection that Congressmen are making, as I understand, that you are not getting the highest kind.

Mr. BRITTEN. If that were true, the fault lies entirely with the superior officers directing matters rather than with those who are assigned here.

The enormous volume of administrative work in Washington must be done by some one, and it should be done by American soldiers and naval officers. For a great deal of this work younger men are needed to give efficiency to the organization, just as they are needed in other great business organizations.

Some Members of Congress seem to have forgotten that these men, young and old, are doing the most important work of the war, which is to maintain the line of communication 3,000 miles across the Atlantic. They are doing the same work here that is being done in London and Paris, and by the staff officers behind the trenches, who are maintaining the lines of communication over there.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think it necessary, in order that these gentlemen may furnish the most expert service, that they should wear a uniform and the insignia of the fighting men?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; they certainly should wear the uniform. The uniform is not so distasteful to me as it is to some people.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the uniform is not distasteful to any patriotic citizen, but no one wants the uniform to be cheapened by being worn by men who do not plan or purpose or expect to fight or do anything in connection with fighting. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is entirely in error. If you are going to criticize the young men as well as the old men who come to Washington, you should criticize their superior officers who bring them here.

Do not criticize the men who wear the uniform. Criticize the superior officers over them. They bring them here from Chicago and elsewhere throughout the country because of the particular abilities that they have. They want to go to the front, and in many instances plead to go, and the superior officers say, "No; you can not go, because we need you particularly here." Do not blame them for being here. I know that in this one division, the Procurement Division of the Ordnance Bureau, the salaries of men now wearing the uniform before they were commissioned were more than $800,000 in the aggregate, and their salaries from the Government now are less than $60,000 a year for all of them combined.

There has been a demand for efficient management in Washington. The administrative machinery has been improved by the process whereby civilians were drawn into the military service. There may be a few isolated instances where officers are doing clerical work, but they are few and far between.

Army men are paid poorly. Nearly all those who have entered the service recently are getting much less money than they earned in private life. They would not work for the War Department if their employment were to be stigmatized. They would not have come here if calls for them had not been issued and published far and wide.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Has my friend made an investigation as to the number of those in uniform that are not noncombatants who may be sent to the line at any time?

Mr. BRITTEN. All of the Staff Corps are supposed to be noncombatants, yet some of them are this very moment in the front-line trenches.

Mr. FESS. Yes. Is it not true that those who are not noncombatants are subject to being sent away?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes. They may go to-morrow or next week or next month. We are keeping a line of communication open 3,000 miles from here to the trenches. We have presidents of steel companies and presidents of other great corporations working here at a nominal salary of $2,000 or $3,000 a year because of their expert knowledge in a particular direction, at a personal sacrifice to themselves. The appearance here of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] recalls one that I have in mind, Benjamin Carpenter, of the house of George B. Carpenter, a house known all the world over for its tentage and cord. Benjamin Carpenter left his business to come here at the urgent request of his Government to assist in the purchase of tentage, cotton duck, and cordage at a salary of probably $3,600 a year and a commission of captain. Probably before he left Chicago his salary was $50,000 a year. That type of men make up the reserve officers in the District of Columbia.

The impression has been created that there are many thousands of officers in the Ordnance Department. The following is an accurate comparison of the status of the personnel of the various divisions on March 3.

The total personnel of the Ordnance Department located in Washington is 9,091, of which only 1,999 are commissioned, 1,238 are enlisted, and 5,855 are civilian employees. Of the latter two-thirds are women.

PROCUREMENT DIVISION.

The Procurement Division of the Ordnance Department is the third largest division of the Ordnance Department. It consists of 240 officers, 134 enlisted men, and 838 civilian employees, making a total of 1,212. The officers are divided as follows: One colonel, 6 lieutenant colonels, 19 majors, 77 captains, 97 first lieutenants, and 50 second lieutenants.

THE TASK OF THE PROCUREMENT DIVISION.

This division, it is estimated, will probably expend in the next year between $3,500,000,000 and $4,000,000,000. It is hard to realize what this means, but when one considers that there are very few business organizations in this country that turn over $100,000,000 a year, and that the Procurement Division of the Ordnance Department is handling forty times that amount in a year, we can realize the task which is theirs to perform.

It is safe to say that if a private organization doing such an enormous business did exist, that its personnel would be several times larger than that of the Ordnance Department.

OFFERED COMMISSIONS.

The commissioned personnel of the Ordnance Department has been selected with the greatest possible care. Men have been selected from almost every industry in the country because of their high reputation as authorities in their particular line of work. These men, in almost every case, received a telegram from the War Department requesting them to come to Washington, where they were offered commissions.

There are hundreds of cases among the 2,000 officers in the Ordnance Department in Washington where the first intimation that the officer had of his likelihood of securing a commission was when he appeared in Washington in response to this telegram and was urged to accept a commission.

DIFFICULTY OF SECURING COMPETENT OFFICERS.

The Ordnance Department will need, before this war is over, many times the officers and civilian employees that it now has, and if we allow this branch of the service to be cheapened in the eyes of the public by the undeserved criticism which it has received, we will find it increasingly more difficult each day to secure the type of men which will be so vitally needed. The morale of the department has already been seriously affected by the adverse criticism. Officers who sacrificed everything to comply with the Government's request for their services are beginning to feel ashamed of being attached to an organization which received such unjustified comment from the public.

TYPE OF OFFICERS SECURED.

As an illustration of the type of men that have been secured, I have a list of 25 captains and majors of the Procurement Division, whose names were taken at random. It was found that the combined salaries from the business that they were actively engaged in before the war was $855,000 per year. These men are to-day working for the Government for from $2,400 to $3,000 a year each, or a total of less than $60,000.

NOT LIABLE FOR DRAFT.

It is quite true that many officers in the Ordnance Department are within the draft age, but a very small percentage of this total would be liable for service under the present draft rules.

The Procurement Division will serve as a good illustration of this, as it is the third largest in the Ordnance Department. Of the 240 officers in this division at the present time, 109 are within the draft age, and of this number 43 are unmarried. In other words, 17.9 per cent of the organization are in class A1. But this small percentage eligible for service in the field were in the deferred classes, which would not be called for some time, or they would not have been accepted for commission.

TRAINING CAMP MEN.

It should not be forgotten that the Training Camps Association advertised widely through the newspapers for men to attend the Plattsburg training camps, and these men were promised commissions providing they attended camp and passed their examinations. When it was found, at the close of the second camp, that there were not enough vacancies in the line for one-half of the men that should receive commissions the administration was the recipient of the severest criticism for inducing patriotically inclined men to sacrifice their business and everything of value to them to go into the camp and work for three months and then be turned down. An inestimable amount of trouble for the department was averted by foisting the training-camp officers on the Signal Corps, Ordnance and Quartermaster Departments. Representative officers attended all of these camps throughout the country begging the men to take commissions in the noncombatant branches of the service, and the Personnel Division is receiving every day letters requesting overseas service from these men who sacrificed their business and positions to go into the line and were detailed to Washington.

DANGER OF DISRUPTING ORGANIZATION.

The Production Divisions of the Ordnance and the Quartermaster Departments and the Production Division of the Aviation Corps are the very foundations of our fighting machine. If these departments are disrupted and disorganized by breaking up their personnel at the present time, our fighting machine would be helpless.

MEN PROMINENT IN CIVIL LIFE.

The following is a list of prominent officers connected with the Ordnance Department:

Col. Samuel McRoberts, Chief of the Procurement Division, is well known as the vice president of the United States Chamber of Commerce and the executive manager of the National City Bank of New York. He is well known as having been actively engaged in the purchasing for the British and French Governments since the beginning of the war. His experience in this work is inestimable.

Lieut. Col. C. N. Black, formerly of the firm of Ford, Bacon & Davis, was one of the principal aids to Mr. Stettinius in negotiating the purchase of British munitions.

Lieut. Col. R. P. Lamont was formerly president of the American Steel Foundry Co., of Chicago, and has already made himself almost invaluable.

Lieut. Col. W. Williams was commissioner of immigration of New York City.

Senator C. W. Watson, of West Virginia, who has just been appointed lieutenant colonel and assistant to Col. McRoberts, is well known.

Col. G. E. Tripp, chairman of the board of directors of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co., at a salary in excess of $100,000 a year, is now Chief of the Production Division.

Lieut. Col. W. P. Barber was for some time vice president of the Midvale Steel Co.

Lieut. Col. Hunt, prior to entering the service, was assistant to the vice president of the American Locomotive Co., at a salary of not less than $40,000 a year.

And so on down the line.

Maj. J. G. Scrugham was previously State engineer of Nevada.

Capt. William H. Gelshenen, of the raw-materials section of the Ordnance Department, received a salary in excess of $100,000 a year.

Capt. G. C. Pierce had the reputation of being the best business executive in the State of Florida.

Maj. H. H. Lehman, of Lehman Bros., bankers, of New York City, in charge of the equipment section, is unquestionably one of the finest experts on textiles in this country.

Col. John R. Simpson, now an assistant to Gen. Wheeler and formerly chief of the procurement section, was vice president of Filene & Co., of Boston, one of the largest dry goods concerns in New England.

Maj. Kirk Askew, of the Engineering Bureau, design section, was the head of the Askew Saddlery Co., of Kansas City.

Maj. Bashford Dean, curator of the Metropolitan Museum, devoting his time to the designing of the steel helmets and armor, is considered one of the greatest experts on arms and armor in the world.

Maj. W. A. Starrett, formerly of Thompson, Starrett & Co., of New York, is now Chief of the Construction Division of the Quartermaster Department.

I have already mentioned Capt. Benj. Carpenter, who was enrolled in the Quartermaster Corps in January, 1917, when he was the manager of George B. Carpenter & Co., of Chicago, where he had spent the best part of his life as an expert in cotton duck, tentage, cordage, and so forth. Capt. Walter Goodwillie was an expert in box manufacture, lumber, and so forth.

Such men as these can not be selected easily, and they will be increasingly harder to secure if the Ordnance Department continues to receive the adverse criticism which it has.

THE BRITISH ORGANIZATION.

The British organization is entirely different to ours. They have a ministry of munitions, which is principally civilian, employing 16,331 people, of whom 9,444 are women. Their percentage of female employees is not greater than ours.

The army ordnance corps are entirely commissioned, as is also the case with the war-office staff, which is considerably larger in its scope and duties than our General Staff and employs a very much larger personnel.

The commissioned officers attached to the ministry of munitions and army ordnance corps and the war-office staff is in excess of the number of officers attached to the Ordnance and Quartermaster Departments and the flying corps in this country.

A word should be said for many of the younger officers. Many of these men, failing to withstand the hardships of camp life, for which they were not sufficiently strong, or failing to gain admission to the second camp, volunteered for service and came to Washington for the Ordnance Reserve Corps.

It is not generally known, as the exodus has been very gradual, but many officers from the Ordnance Department have already been sent overseas or have received their orders to do so.

At the present time many ordnance officers lately in Washington are taking a special course of scientific training at the arsenals for the special purpose of being detailed for the field army overseas as soon as possible.

Eventually there will be more than twice as many Ordnance officers in France as there are now in Washington. In fact, Gen. Pershing's estimates are far in excess of this number. It will take 2,000 officers to handle the enlisted personnel of the supply division in the field alone. The casualty list in this branch of the service will consequently undoubtedly be heavy. In fact, the British do not consider the ordnance department a noncombatant branch of the service.

The following method has been pursued in selecting officers from among those who have volunteered for service:

The applicant for commission is first interviewed by the personnel officer who looks over his list of recommendations which he brings and inquires further into his training and his knowledge of a special subject important in the procurement of ordnance material. Then, referring to the list of assistants required for special work by the chiefs of sections, the personnel officer directs the applicant to see the officer whom he believes could make the best use of his qualifications.

Providing that he is believed to be satisfactory by this officer to whom he has been sent, an indorsement to that effect is sent back to the personnel officer with the applicant.

If his qualifications are not sufficient to warrant his being commissioned, he is immediately turned down. If satisfactory, he is recommended by the division personnel officer to the ordnance personnel section for commission with a certain specified rank, to be detailed to the section requiring his services.

The next step after he has been approved for a certain position is to send him before the medical board for examination. After which, if the physical examination is successfully passed, his papers are indorsed to that effect, and he is sent to the military board which convenes at certain times for the purpose of questioning and examining the applicant for commission. This is an intimate verbal examination which goes into the education, training in business of the applicant, the salary that he has received, the experience that he has had with the subject on which he is to work, his age, and the general personality and appearances which are required of an officer in the United States Army.

It is an extremely rare thing for a man to be commissioned in the grade as high as major, and among these few it is safe to say that they are in every case elderly men who have controlled large business interests in private life and whose pay from the Government as major would not in most cases be more than 10 or 15 per cent of the salaries which they have received from the concerns with which they were connected.

Comparison of present status of personnel of the various bureaus and divisions under ordnance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more? I realize that I am talking out of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I do not like to object, but this is foreign to the matter which the committee is considering.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think this is very important. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no objection to the gentleman's having two minutes, but after that I shall object.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may have five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think that is trespassing upon the committee.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think he will finish in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will finish in five minutes.

My only desire is to call the attention of Congress to these facts. I have spent considerable time in looking up men from all parts of the country who have been commissioned here and who are doing wonderful work. Some of them are within the draft age and others are not, but the stigma attaches to all of them just as soon as they are criticized for being here as bomb-proof soldiers and slackers, and so forth.

If the men who are doing staff duty in Washington are to be called slackers, whether young or old, the administrative machinery will fail. Every young man needed here to perform the honorable tasks of war will feel that he should be permitted to go to the front. No one will want to be part of the Ordnance Department nor the Quartermaster's Department. If civilians take their places, the discipline will relax. Civilians can not be court-martialed for dereliction of duty, whereas the soldiers can be.

I think it is a shame to dishonor the men who are loyally serving their country by calling them slackers when they are doing merely what they have been asked to do; what they have been taught to believe was required of them; what they are willing to do, regardles of the sacrifice that is involved. We should do honor to the men who wear the uniform, whether in the dry, but necessary, staff work or on the battle field.

The marines are not slackers because they remain at home. God knows they have longed to get to France, and they are the best-trained fighters we have. Somebody somewhere has decided they must stay at home, and they must take their orders.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McKENZIE. I just want to make a short statement and then ask a question. We all think of a soldier as a man who goes into places of danger. That is his profession. We think of the captain of industry as the man who looks after the production of the things necessary in time of peace and in time of war. Now I want to ask my colleague, without any word of criticism against these great captains of industry who are doing so much for our country now, if he does not believe that they could render just as efficient service in civilian clothes as they can in the uniform of a soldier? [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. No; I do not agree with my colleague from Illinois, notwithstanding his great knowledge of military affairs and the important position he holds as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House. I will say that if you took the uniform away from these very same men their efficiency would be lessened, discipline would be lost, and in case they did violate their oath of office, you could not try them by court-martial. They ought to be quickly tried by court-martial if they do anything wrong. They are in the military, and that is where they belong; and if they come here at great sacrifice to themselves and desire to wear the uniform, what objection is there to their wearing it? What difference does it make whether a man wears a brown khaki suit or a grey summer suit as long as he is performing a very valuable technical service to the Government and the Government needs him? If you are going to blame anyone, blame the Government; blame the Commander in Chief; blame the officers who bring these men here; but do not stigmatize the uniform and the man wearing it just because he happens to be here in the reserve. He is willing to go to France. He wants to go. Let me call your attention to the figures. In the Bureau of Ordnance there are 9,091 employees. Only 1,900 of them are commissioned officers. Twelve hundred of them are enlisted men and 5,855 of them are civilians. A great majority of them are civilians. If a man from Chicago has expert knowledge and the Government wants him, they say to him, "We can not pay you a tenth of the salary you have been getting, but we will commission you a captain for service in the Army," and the man comes. It does not hurt him. On the contrary, it helps the country, and he will serve it just as willingly in France as here.

Mr. JAMES. Would he not come unless he got the uniform?

Mr. BRITTEN. No doubt he would; but his commission is in the interest of efficiency, discipline, and economy.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I agree heartily with the gentleman that these men who are performing distinctive military service ought to be wearing the military uniform. Now, suppose the opportunity was given to these officers in Washington to go to France if they desired to do so; how many of them would be left here?

Mr. BRITTEN. I should say that less than 10 per cent might be left here and 90 per cent would go across as quickly as ships could carry them.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There would not be 5 per cent left here.

Mr. BRITTEN. No; probably there would not be 1 per cent of them left here. They all want to go; but many must remain here to conduct this enormous supply problem if we are to be at all successful on the other side.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. If you will observe the corps to which these different men are assigned, you will find that there is not a single infantryman or cavalryman or artilleryman in the line of the Army. If these men should go to France they would still serve in these noncombatant corps. None of them would be considered combatants, no matter where they would go.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is no question about that. Because of their superior technical knowledge they would still be back of the line.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The question is whether it is essential to give these men the uniform of the man who fights. The service uniform is made a special color for the purpose of protecting the man who has to go into battle. The objection is made here that these men are given the uniform of the fighting man, which is not necessary.

Mr. BRITTEN. Do not blame the man who wears the uniform, but blame his superior officers who gave it to him. The color of his uniform is no guide to his heroism or his desire to fight or his loyalty to his Government. He may be here to-day and in the very thick of the fight in 60 days from now.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman spoke about breaking down the spirit of these men. Do I understand that if we do not quit criticizing these men they will leave these jobs and go to France?

Mr. BRITTEN. Many of them would like to use that as an excuse to get across quickly, if permitted.

Mr. WALSH. Why can they not stand a little criticism that people think is well founded? What is there different about these men which makes them unlike other men?

Mr. BRITTEN. The cricticism is not well founded, and they are no different from any other brave American who is seeking to do his bit to the point of sacrificing his life if need be.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is unjust.

Mr. WALSH. There may be a difference of opinion about that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With reference to these officers who have gone through the training camps and others who have been ordered here, is not the gentleman aware that many of these men have received these commissions with the understanding that they should not be sent out of Washington?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; that is not a correct statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is, Is there objection to the gentleman's request to extend his remarks?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to have read in my time a letter from the secretary of the Colorado Chapter of the American Mining Congress indorsing the principles of this bill. It is a measure that affects Colorado, and the men represented by these gentlemen are those who operate the mines that will be controlled under this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE COLORADO METAL MINING ASSOCIATION,
COLORADO CHAPTER, AMERICAN MINING CONGRESS,
Denver, Colo., April 22, 1918.

Hon. EDWARD KEATING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Herewith find copy of resolution passed at a meeting of the principal Colorado producers of metals affected, which, so far as we know, appears to be the unanimous sentiment of mining men of this State who have investigated the proposed measure and whose operations will come under the provisions of H. R. 11259.

We ask your cooperation and support to the end of an early enactment of this bill.

Again expressing our appreciation of your effective work in behalf of the mining industry, I remain

Yours, very truly, M. B. TOMBLIN, Secretary.

Resolution.

Resolved, That the Colorado Chapter of the American Mining Congress and the Colorado Metal Mining Association are in full accord with the purposes of the administration as outlined in the provisions of the bill proposed by the war-minerals committee to create an administration for the mineral industry and believe that important and much-desired results may be accomplished thereunder, but they trust that the powers conferred by section 12 will be so employed as will least disturb established enterprises and existing conditions, particularly those affecting labor.

As attested by the Federal Bureau of Mines, Colorado can greatly increase its output of manganese and pyrites as well as the rare minerals, tungsten, vanadium, and molybdenum. Adequate and stabilized prices as provided for in this bill will enable producers of this State to contribute a large proportion of the amount necessary to take the place of imported ores and minerals.

"The mining men of Colorado herein express their desire to cooperate to the fullest extent with the Government in its efforts to increase the production of minerals necessary for the successful prosecution of the war and tender the facilities of their organization unreservedly to that end.

Adopted at a representative meeting of tungsten, molybdenum, pyrite, vanadium, and manganese producers of Colorado at a meeting held in Denver, April 2, 1918.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I want to ask the Clerk to read a letter from Secretary Lane, written to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] on April 18, with reference to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it a message to the House?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a letter written by Secretary Lane to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Intended to be a message to the House?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is a letter to the majority leader, written to him as a Representative, and also a copy of the resolution by the New York section of the Mining and Metallurgical Society of America.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 18, 1918.

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. KITCHIN: A serious situation is developing with regard to war minerals, and to meet it I hope you may find it possible to give prompt consideration to H. R. 11259, which proposes means for stimulating local production and distributing to best advantage imported and domestic supplies. Many of these minerals are vital to winning the war as well as necessary to our national industries. The Shipping Board must, however, take tonnage which reduces our imports. To a large extent domestic supplies can be called out to meet the need, but this can not be done quickly enough by ordinary agencies since it takes time to open and equip mines.

It is proposed, so far as may be possible, to anticipate difficulties, and there are numerous acute wants already to be met. As it now stands there is no agency which has the means or authority to meet the situation quickly and efficiently, so it becomes necessary to ask Congress, busy as I know you all are, to create machinery through which the Executive may act.

If you will see that the matter is promptly taken up, it will make it just so much easier to avoid a most grave situation which is developing.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Resolution of New York section of the Mining and Metallurgical Society of America.

Recognizing the extreme importance of the minerals administration bill now before Congress the President of the Mining and Metallurgical Society of America, on March 16, 1918, duly called a special meeting to be held in New York on April 18 for the purpose of discussing this bill and eliciting the opinion of the members. This meeting having been properly called, was convened immediately thereafter and the following resolution offered:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that the general principles of this bill tend to further the efficiency of the Government in prosecuting the war while safeguarding the welfare of the mineral industry, and that this or a similar bill should be made a law, provided, however, that the products covered by said bill as passed shall include only such minerals and metals as are really required for war-emergency needs as are those specifically enumerated on page 2 of draft before this meeting, viz, H. R. 11259."

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, answering the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] a few moments ago in regard to the reference in the bill in section 3 to section 41 of chapter 321, Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large, the bill provides that no one connected with the administration of this law, either as a firm or an individual, may be connected with any contract that may be made by reason of his position of influence in the administration of the law. Of course, it was not intended to repeal section 41, which reads as follows:

SEC. 41. No officer or agent of any corporation, joint-stock company, or association, and no member or agent of any firm, or person directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm, shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm. Whoever shall violate the provisions of this section shall be fined not more than $2,000 and imprisoned not more than two years.

It was not the intention of the committee to repeal that sound provision of the general statute.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman would not contend that section 41 would be affected at all by the provisions of this bill?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not believe that it would, and yet the framers of the bill wanted to be certain that this section of the statute would not be affected by the enactment of this law.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person, except as otherwise provided by this act, willfully to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; to restrict the supply of any necessaries; to restrict distribution of any necessaries; to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof; to exact excessive prices for any necessaries; or to conspire, confine, agree, or arrange with any other person, or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 8, after the word "person," strike out "except as otherwise provided by this act."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I presume that this clause has some purpose. As it is inserted, the language in this section, except for this clause, is almost verbatim with the section contained in the food-control act.

I made the motion for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if under this act anywhere any person is authorized "to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with the production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, to monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries, or to engage in any discriminatory and unfair or any deceptive or wasteful practice." If this bill does authorize it, it ought not to.

Mr. FOSTER. It would not be unlawful for the Government to do it.

Mr. ANDERSON. The Government would not be affected by this language. The Government is not subject to criminal prosecution. So it strikes me that the chairman and the committee did not give to this section the consideration that they should have given to it. What is the purpose of putting in the words "except as otherwise provided by this act"?

Mr. HAMLIN. This section refers to section 6, which defines what is meant by hoarding.

Mr. ANDERSON. It specifically refers to it so that there is no necessity for these words.

Mr. HAMLIN. As I take it, the intention was not to make it unlawful for the Government to hoard and store these materials. Under certain conditions waste or depreciation might result from the storage of these minerals by the Government. I did not draft the bill, but that is the way I have construed that provision of it—that the words "except as otherwise provided in this act" had reference to the provision in the bill which provides that under certain conditions where there was an overproduction the Government, in order to protect its guaranty as to minimum price, might be compelled to store and hold until it could find a market for the materials.

Under this provision, anyone storing or hoarding the minerals at the direction and for the benefit of the Government could not be liable of a violation of this act.

Mr. ANDERSON. It empowers the Government to do these things. This particular section refers only to persons and imposes a criminal penalty on those who violate it. The Government is not subject to criminal penalty and would not do a thing unlawful. This is not a limitation on the Government activities at all and has no place in the bill and ought to go out.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think we will not object to the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. While I am on my feet, I would like to call attention to one other thing.

Mr. HAMLIN. I made that suggestion with the idea that we can hurry on.

Mr. ANDERSON. You can. In line 23, the last word in the line is "confine." Obviously, it ought to be "combine."

Mr. FOSTER. That is correct, and I am glad the gentleman called attention to that.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote upon the amendment I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the word "confine," line 23, page 5, be changed to "combine."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the change indicated by the gentleman from Illinois will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to make an inquiry of the members of the committee as to whether the committee gave any consideration to the question of the constitutionality of this section so far as it attempts to restrict the supply of these articles which are described as necessaries, which may not be used in any way in connection with the activities of the Government in respect to war? This bill, as stated in section 1, defines "necessaries" as consisting of certain named minerals. The definition is not limited to those used by the Government only in its military activities, but it extends to all those minerals which may be used in private manufacture, independent of any connection with military activities on the part of the Government. In section 4 it is made a penal offense for any private manufacturer, regardless of whether the minerals are used or produced for the benefit of the Government, to restrict the supply. On what theory does the committee proceed that the Government under the war powers of Congress has the right to restrict the supply of the manufacturer or miner of minerals that are in no way used or to be used in military operations?

Mr. FOSTER. We propose here to punish him for doing these things which we declared to be unlawful.

Mr. STAFFORD. What right has the Government of the United States to control the activity of a private individual, even in war time, and under the vague powers of the Constitution known as the war powers in the supply of articles that are in no way to be used in connection with war activities?

Mr. FOSTER. We do not restrict him here.

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to the language in lines 19 and 20, where you make it a penal offense to restrict the supply of any necessaries, and going back to section 1 we find out what are those necessaries—not articles used by the Government in war activities, but any of these articles named used in any way.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, I am not a constitutional lawyer—I am not a lawyer at all—but I do not know anything in the Constitution that prohibits the Government from going out at any time and restricting these supplies.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think any person having the slightest knowledge of constitutional law would hold that this provision would be constitutional in peace times, or that we would have the right in war times to restrict the supply of some commodity described in section 1, which would be utilized other than for war purposes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me make this suggestion to the gentleman: Suppose that the supply of antimony or any other of the enumerated articles is limited. Suppose that the private consumer does hoard it, so that the supply for the necessary operations of the governmental activities is limited. Would not that be within the war power?

Mr. STAFFORD. But suppose that the supply of antimony is not limited, as has been testified to here, as to other named minerals. Suppose there is plenty of ferromanganese in the country, not only for the use of the Government in war activities but for use in private manufacturing. Does the gentleman mean to say, as a constitutional lawyer, that with ample supplies, not only for governmental but for other purposes, we could penalize a man for limiting the supply?

Mr. TOWNER. That, of course, is a pertinent question. The question then would be raised and would have to be determined by the Government, that as a matter of fact it was necessary that the supply should be prevented from being used in order to decrease the supply necessary for the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but this bill is not delimited in that respect, so that it only extends to the supply of those commodities which are necessary for carrying on war activities. It applies generally.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Is it not a principle of common law that society has the right to prevent the restriction of an article or the limitation or the monopolization of an article which is necessary for the community?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know that there is any fundamental principle of common law that enables this Congress, which is a body with limited powers, defined by the Constitution, to go to the extent we are saying we can go here. This authorization can only be justified under the war powers. Heretofore in following a policy of this character of legislation we have justified it on the ground of the commerce clause. The Sherman Antitrust Act is based upon the theory of regulating commerce. There is no such provision contained in this section limiting its effect to interstate shipments.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from New York is not yet through.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think either of the gentlemen ought to abuse the Constitution with such a small attendance of the committee here.

Mr. STAFFORD. While I am always willing for the watch dog of the RECORD to make a point of order, I will not yield for any other purpose. That is his privilege, but he can not take me off the floor in any other way.

Mr. LONDON. Laws to prevent the monopolization of food were enacted during the Middle Ages in England. Society had always attempted to try to protect itself against monopoly under the general-welfare clause and under the clause imposing the duty of providing for the public defense. I believe that the Congress has the power to prohibit the monopolization of any article which is essential to the welfare of the country at a particular time.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman may go back into the Middle Ages for his authority, but he can find nothing in any decision in the Supreme Court, even based on the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, which would uphold that extreme position.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of directing the attention of the chairman of the committee to the last phrase of this section. There must be a skip here, in my opinion. It says here:

To conspire, confine, agree, or arrange with any other person, or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section.

Now, does not that mean to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person to do the thing made unlawful by this section, or to aid or abet the doing thereof?

Mr. FOSTER. The matter has been called to my attention by the gentleman from Missouri, and that is a legal proposition.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will say I was about ready to offer an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. I did not know that, and the Clerk was about to read.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNER. I think action has not been taken on the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee to strike out the word "confine" and insert the word "combine."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated to the committee without objection the change indicated by the gentleman from Illinois would be made, and there was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to perfect the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 24, after the word "person," insert "to do or perform any of the acts or things prohibited by this section."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. KITCHIN having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11259 and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately following the remarks of the Speaker earlier in the afternoon there be printed in the RECORD a copy of the telegram of the governor of Missouri offering him the Senatorship and also a copy of the Speaker's letter declining the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has heard the request of the gentleman from Kentucky. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House proceed with the Private Calendar, and consider the bill H. R. 11663, an omnibus pension bill.

Mr. CANNON. And on the completion we will then adjourn, I take it.

Mr. RUSSELL. We will move to adjourn after that.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is this a general pension bill?

Mr. SHERWOOD. It is a general pension bill, and will not take over 10 minutes; it is a short bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11663) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will proceed to read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws—

The name of Irwin Jordon, late of Company F, Forty-fifth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Richard G. Paynter, late of Company G, Ninth Regiment Delaware Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Joshua J. Workman, late of Company D, Ninth Regiment Delaware Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of John H. Swain, late of Company D, Ninth Regiment Delaware Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of John J. Morath, late of Company I, Seventieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of James P. Leonard, late of Company H, Third Regiment Delaware Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Easter A. Cantrell, widow of Edward M. Cantrell, late of Company A, Forty-eighth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Abiather F. Crane, late of Company H, One hundred and forty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Felix G. McGuire, late of Company A, Seventh Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Charlotte Heald, former widow of Willard E. Converse, late of Company G, Thirty-eighth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Alonzo C. Horton, late of Company E, One hundred and thirty-seventh Regiment Ohio National Guard Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Ellen E. Greenfield, widow of William A. Greenfield, late of Company C, Twenty-ninth Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $29 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving: Provided, That in the event of the death of either or both of said minor children of said William A. Greenfield the additional pension herein granted shall cease and determine: And provided further, That in the event of the death of Ellen E. Greenfield the names of said Marguerite A. and Wilma A. Greenfield shall be placed on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, from and after the date of the death of said Ellen E. Greenfield, as provided by the law under which now pensioned.

During the reading of the bill,

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Frederick Willman, late of Company C, One hundred and thirty-first Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Page 3, line 18, substitute "$36" for "$30."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 18, strike out "$30" and insert in lieu thereof "$36."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, to-day is set apart as Liberty Day, when thousands who have subscribed to the third liberty loan will march down historic Pennsylvania Avenue, calling the attention of our country to the necessity of supporting financially the prosecution of this world-wide war.

It is a great pleasure for me to be able to say that all the eight counties in the second congressional district of Oklahoma, which I have the honor to represent on this floor, have already "gone over the top." [Applause.] Some of them subscribed their full quota before nightfall on the first day the loan was offered, and all subscribed their full quota before the end of the first week.

I am sure this achievement should be given a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and is an example worthy of emulation throughout the country. The people of Oklahoma can be depended upon under all circumstances to support their Government. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Doctor William Warren, late of Company I, Fifteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 15, in line 3, the name is incorrectly printed in the bill. It should be "Warner" instead of "Warren."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice in the name the gentleman is seeking to correct, the first word is "Doctor." I would like to inquire whether that is merely the title or his Christian name?

Mr. RUSSELL. It is not a professional title. It is the name of the party.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose his parents expected him to live up to his name, but he never got that far.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REREFERENCE OF BILL—MERCHANT-MARINE SERVICE.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to rerefer the bill H. R. 10782 from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The reference was clearly an inadvertence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to rerefer the bill mentioned by him to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, what is the bill about?

Mr. SIMS. The title of the bill is as follows:

To amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to amend section 4131 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to improve the merchant-marine service and thereby also to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve, and for other purposes," as amended by act approved October 22, 1914.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has no jurisdiction of it, and it is clearly entitled to be referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the rereference of the bill as indicated? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman reserve that for a minute?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have a small pension bill that I would like to get through.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman insist on the point of order?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 3, noes 43.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, what becomes of my point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to withhold that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I thought we had an understanding a few minutes ago that at the conclusion of the pension bill offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] the House would adjourn.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. I would like to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that this is pension day, and that the other committee has a small bill here that we would like to get through. Otherwise it would have to go over for two or three weeks. It will take only a few minutes to pass it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

PENSIONS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 11658.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio calls up the bill H. R. 11658, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11658) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws—

The name of Rufus F. Gibbs, late of Company I, Twenty-seventh Regiment United States Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Milton K. Jenkinson, late of Company E, Second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of Henry J. Seiders, late of Company G, Ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of Charles W. Coleman, late of Ninth Company, United States Coast Artillery, Regular Establishment, and pay him a pension at the rate of $17 per month.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, a dollar mark is missing in the printed copy on line 1 of page 11 before the figures "25." I ask unanimous consent that it be supplied by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. KEY of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KEY of Ohio, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RESIGNATION FROM A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House the following communication, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House.

MY DEAR SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Very truly,
S. D. FESS.

APRIL 26, 1918.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the mining bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the mining bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on American shipping and the pneumatic-tube service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on American shipping and the pneumatic-tube service. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what connection there is between American shipping and the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. HEFLIN. I mean those are the two subjects I want to touch on in extending my remarks.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, are they the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I do not object to this request, but I was in hopes that somebody might get up before we adjourned and ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD by bursting into song. [Laughter.] We have had all other kinds of requests for extensions of remarks. I want to warn the House that I am going on the rampage again on this subject. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 27, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Petition of the Good Hope Farm Club, Gerald, Mo., for the relief of farmers in general and especially those of Missouri; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Petitions urging the repeal of the second-class postage rider to the war-revenue act by L. Ezekiel, the Woman's Forum, the New York Medical Journal, E. J. Elder, and M. Buesing; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the Building Trades Department, American Federation of Labor, urging the passage of House bill 6107; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DILL: Petition of Mrs. D. L. Davis and other ladies of Spokane, Wash., urging that there be no further wastage of man power, food, fuel, and efficiency by the further manufacture of alcoholic liquors and asking for nation-wide prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DOOLING: Memorial of the Merchants' Association of New York, favoring the Owen-Dyer bill, equalizing the rank of Army medical officers with that of the Navy; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petitions of the Rockford (Ill.) Manufacturers' and Shippers' Association and of the Edward Hines Lumber Co., Chicago, Ill., for legislation to permit the payment of income and excess-profits taxes in installments; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. IGOE: Petition of Lithuanian National Council, of St. Louis, concerning the independence of Lithuania; also a petition of certain citizens of St. Louis, on the partition of Poland and the settlement of the Polish question; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SCHALL: Petition of Mr. C. L. Williams and 114 other citizens of Kanabee County, Minn., favoring the transfer of jurisdiction of persons charged with violation of the espionage act from civil to military courts; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEENERSON: Petition of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, protesting against the enactment of House bill 8859, for the relief of Ben Fairbanks and others; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. SWIFT: Affidavits to accompany House bill 8623; to the Committee on Claims.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 27, 1918.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 24, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 3803) authorizing the President during the existing emergency to sell supplies, materials, equipment, and other property heretofore or hereafter purchased, acquired, or manufactured by the United States in connection with, or incidental to, the prosecution of the war, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 11658. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 11663. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of sundry Chippewa Indians residing on the White Earth Indian Reservation, Minn., remonstrating against the payment of certain sums out of their funds to Ben. L. Fairbanks and others, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Fulda Reading Club, of Fulda, Minn., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Duluth Presbytery, at Two Harbors, Minn., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of the Northern Machinery Co., of Minneapolis, of the Citizens Alliance, of Minneapolis, and of the American Hoisting Derrick Co., of St. Paul, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the adoption of the proposed amendment to the naval appropriation bill penalizing the granting of bonuses and premiums to employees in the navy yards, which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of H. M. Warren Post, No. 12, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts, of Wakefield, Mass., praying for an increase in the pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 4452) granting an increase of pension to Frank Libby (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 4453) to establish the military record of Marshall M. Pool; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 4454) granting a pension to Richard R. Trench; and

A bill (S. 4455) granting an increase of pension to W. S. Lambert; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $400,000 for extension of Piers Nos. 4, 4a, 5, and 6, and $1,200,000 for power plant, etc., at the navy yard, Boston, Mass., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 11658. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 11663. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, something is wrong; our war preparations are not moving as they ought to move. The President thinks he needs the power given by this bill to do what ought to be done. He will not use what he has till this is passed. It is therefore necessary. I shall vote for it whether amended or not, and let the future take care of any failure or unwise action. This is all I care to say on this bill, but I am going to take a few moments to speak of legislation which I deem of supreme importance, but which I understand a legislator high in the councils of the Democratic Party thinks we should postpone until after the fall elections, although it is not a party question at all.

Sir Adam Beck, chairman of the Hydroelectric Commission of the Province of Ontario, Canada, in testifying last week before the Water Power Committee of the House of Representatives, described the wonderful impetus given to the industrial growth of that community through delivery of 315,000 hydroelectric horsepower generated at Niagara Falls, and said that further water-power developments which were about to be undertaken would increase the production of power in Ontario by 1921 to 750,000 horsepower. I quote from Sir Adam Beck's testimony as follows:

> I wish to tell you now that we are short in the Niagara district, in the Province of Ontario, at least 100,000 horsepower that is essential and necessary at this time, and largely for munition purposes. We have three large American plants on the Canadian side manufacturing explosives or essentials to the war, in the Carbide Co., the Electro-Metals Co., and the Cyanimide Co., and they use between them in the neighborhood of 75,000 horsepower. We have received repeated appeals from Washington to increase these quantities, and we have done everything to curtail the use of power so that these large industries can keep their business going. * * *
> Of course, if we were as greedy as we might be—and I suppose we are human—we would not encourage in any way by an object lesson such as we have here to have you nationalize the water powers on the American side, because these large industries you have will be more likely to establish branch industries in the Province of Ontario to take care of their foreign trade, having labor conditions equally favorable and a much cheaper price of electricity and no fear of an increase in the price of that electricity. * * * We have a large industry now on the St. Lawrence, in the British Chemical Co. It is American, however, entirely. They are establishing a large industry and are only using 4,000, but want 8,000. They are quite safe in assuming that the price will not be increased; that they will not be deprived of that power.

I am informed that in addition to the American industrial plants referred to by Sir Adam Beck, which have been forced to locate in Canada, through inability to obtain cheap hydroelectric power in the United States that several large plants have been built by American capital in the Province of Quebec, which are using over 100,000 horsepower in the aggregate, and which plants would have been built in the United States but for our restrictive water-power laws, which prevented development and utilization of hydroelectric energy here. The American Carbide Co. recently completed an 80,000 horsepower plant in Norway, which also would have been built in this country but for our restrictive laws.

Why does not Congress enact legislation which will make possible the development of our water powers? Why is this not done when we have it on the high authority of the Chief Executive of the land that next to matters relating strictly to the immediate conduct of the war it is the most important public business before Congress. In his message last December the only legislation urged by the President upon Congress other than measures of immediate military necessity was the speedy enactment of laws under which this great natural resource might be utilized. The importance of such legislation can not be overstated. The Senate promptly complied with the President's suggestion and passed the Shields water-power bill on December 14, 1917, dealing with water powers on navigable streams. The House has appointed a special water-power committee, consisting of the six ranking members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Public Lands, and the Agricultural Committees and to it has been referred all water-power bills, including the Shields bill, and a bill prepared by the Departments of War, Interior, and Agriculture, which includes in one measure all phases of the water-power question and contains many of the best features of the Shields and other water-power bills which have been considered by the Senate. I quote extracts from the letter of the Secretaries of War, Interior, and Agriculture, transmitting the administration water-power bill to Hon. T. W. SIMS, chairman of the House committee:

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1916.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SIMS: It is understood your committee will take action at an early date upon various proposals which have been made concerning water-power legislation. On account of the conditions now affecting the power industry and the need of maintaining our entire industrial machinery at its highest efficiency, a satisfactory solution of the water-power problem is, in our judgment, one of the most important steps for the consideration of this Congress and one which should receive attention at the earliest practicable date.

The industrial expansion which has been necessary in order to produce the materials and equipment needed in the prosecution of the war has placed unprecedented demands upon the electric-power industry, to such an extent in fact that the output of commercial central stations has increased more than 60 per cent since 1914. There is also need of legislation in order that time may be given to prepare for the developments that must take place after the close of the war, if the United States is to maintain its proper place in world trade, or even to supply its domestic needs. A survey of our water-power resources is needed, particularly with relation to specific districts and specific industries.

Beyond the need of power development as such is the need of increasing the proportion of water power in order to reduce the drain on our coal and petroleum supplies, particularly the latter. Even if the coal supply were unlimited, the reduction in the demands upon labor and transportation equipment would be sufficient reason for substituting water power for steam power whenever possible. The petroleum supply, particularly in the West where the greatest proportion is used for fuel, is being rapidly depleted, consumption has exceeded production, and stocks in storage are fast disappearing. With the substitution of water power for steam power in central stations and with the electrification of railroads a large part of the use of petroleum for fuel could be eliminated.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.
FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior.
D. F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

For 10 long years restrictive Federal water-power laws have prevented the utilization of the energy contained in our descending waters. This mighty resource has been allowed to waste while enormous quantities of coal and oil have been taken from the earth and used up to meet the ever-increasing demands for electric energy, which during the last decade has increased sixfold.

I dislike to say it, but we of America are wont to deceive ourselves as to actual conditions. We wait until to-morrow to do the things we should have done yesterday. We have not taken advantage of our opportunities as we should.

A little plain talk will not hurt us. I am not driving at any party or at those who have the direction of the Nation's affairs in their hands. But I am finding fault with Congress for holding up water-power development for the past 10 years by unreasonable and indefensible projects of regulation so drastic in their nature as to frighten off any sane investor, and now we are suffering the penalty of sloth. The development of water powers is pioneer work of a hazardous nature, subject to many risks and uncertainties, and, under regulation of rates by public authorities, the hydroelectric business is and must be conducted upon a close margin of profit. Capital, therefore, will not invest nor men put in their time in hydroelectric development except upon a basis which, so far as Government requirements are concerned, will at least not jeopardize the investment or prevent a fair return thereon. The time has come when the country needs the force and energy contained in its wasting water powers to supplement its man power, and the penalty of delay is enforced by fate against the unready. Let us put the blame where it belongs. The fault is with Congress and with Congress alone. It is the lawmaking body. It can not escape that responsibility. The controversy in the country over the character of legislation under which water powers can be developed has been reflected in Congress, and thus far we have been unable to get together. Each extreme has held fast to its own view and our water powers have been idle and wasting. Departmental heads have striven to dominate and form legislation and have been a potent factor in preventing action, but this does not excuse Congress. It should realize the tremendous need. It should harmonize divergent views and, with a due regard for public opinion, frame legislation which it believes will serve the public good. If Congress had acted five years ago and passed suitable legislation, millions and millions of water power would have been utilized that are still going to waste, and the successful carrying on of the war would have been enormously aided, fuel and labor shortage greatly lessened, and the transportation problem rendered much less acute. No single stroke would have helped the present situation so much as a proper hydroelectric law enacted five years ago. But, as the water-power men say, "that's over the dam." The question is, Are we going to benefit by this lesson of "what might have been" or not? Failure of Congress to pass a workable water-power law at this session will be nothing short of crime and disloyalty to the dire necessity of our country. A very heavy responsibility rests upon us, and we must promptly meet it or the country will properly call us to sharp account for neglect of our duty. I could insert in the RECORD a thousand pages of news articles and editorials from the press of the country which have appeared in the past six months calling on Congress to act. I am glad to be able to say that Congress has never made a political question of this great national problem; it has been merely a difference of opinion on details. I call on my fellow Members of Congress, both in the House and in the Senate, to get together and speedily enact legislation which will cure the present stagnation in water-power development. Let us take a broad view of the question, not quibble over details. Congress thought development would take place in the navigable streams under the law of 1910, but it was mistaken. That law was too restrictive, and development has not taken place under it and never will. Germany and Austria have developed 90 per cent of their water powers and we but 10 per cent of ours.

I will describe to you the results which would follow the development of just one of our now wasting water powers. I refer to one contained in the Priest Rapids of the Columbia River, located in the central part of the State of Washington. At the present time there are not over 100 people living within a radius of 20 miles of the locality to which I refer. The river is bordered by hundreds of thousands of acres of volcanic-ash soil—a desert now, owing to the annual rainfall being less than 5 inches—a land which has 325 days of brilliant sunshine and but 40 days of cloud and rain per year. But give that desert soil water and it will produce every crop known to the temperate zone, such as cotton, tobacco, sugar beets, every variety of beans, alfalfa, and all kinds of grain and fruits. There nature has assembled the land, the water, and the power—all useless at the present time, but by developing the power and using it to lift the water to the land, that now silent valley would be brought to life, peopled with thousands of homes, and made to produce agricultural products of quantity ten times greater than sufficient to feed the local population. The Columbia is the twelfth largest river in the world and the second in the United States, and is navigable for 1,000-ton steamers from the Pacific Ocean, into which it flows, to the foot of Priest Rapids, a distance of 400 miles. The dam which it is proposed to build across the river at the foot of the rapids would, with the installation of locks and the removal of some minor obstacles above the head of the rapids, render the river navigable for a farther distance of 200 miles inland, almost to the Canadian boundary, traversing a region now almost devoid of transportation facilities.

The dam, 90 feet high and 1 mile long, would cost approximately $25,000,000 and would develop about 250,000 continuous horsepower. This power would be used for a diversity of purposes, such as the operation of industrial plants for production of electrochemicals, pottery, asbestos material, wood pulp, paper, and beet sugar; in the smelting of lead and silver ores, and for other metallurgical purposes; and also for the electrification of near-by divisions of three transcontinental railroads. The high-water period is providentially also the irrigation period, and the flow of the river from April to October rises sufficiently to furnish water for all near-by land, and also is capable of producing additional power sufficient to raise the water to the land without interfering with the all-the-year power required for the other purposes mentioned above.

Thus the development of this water power would bring an industrial and agricultural population of at least 50,000 people to a now silent land; would open to navigation 200 miles of inland waterway through a region almost devoid of transportation facilities; would save the coal now used to propel the trains of three transcontinental railroads across a large part of the State of Washington, and the river would teem with the traffic resulting from the development of a now almost uninhabited region.

I have given you but one object lesson of what would follow the passage of sane and practical water-power legislation. Yet there are many other water powers awaiting development in the eastern, southern, and western parts of the country which would bring equally beneficial results, and which have been held back from development for years past solely because of the restrictive laws now in force.

I quote from the testimony of a witness who appeared before the special water-power committee of the House at its recent hearings:

The total land-surface area of the 11 public-domain States of the West is 755,915,560 acres, of which 471,033,227 acres is in public ownership and 284,882,333 acres in private ownership. That is, the public domain comprises 62 per cent of the total area of these States, or an area approximately as large as the entire United States east of the Mississippi River. With the exception of the Sacramento, Columbia, Snake, and Missouri Rivers, all the navigable rivers of the country are located in the central, eastern, and southern sections of the United States.

Over 60 per cent of the wasting water powers of the United States are located in nonnavigable streams in the undeveloped portions of the public domain in the far West. The electric energy which could be produced from these water powers would be within easy reach by transmission lines of vast areas of lands, mineral deposits, and other natural resources owned by the Federal Government. These great properties at present idle, and in their present condition almost worthless, could be utilized and made of great value through the development of the water powers in their midst. The land would be brought under cultivation through electrically operated pumping plants, and power would be available to open up mines and operate smelters and for other purposes.

Cities, towns, and villages all over the country offer free sites and cash bonuses to induce the building of manufacturing plants, because they bring increased population, increase taxable values, and enhance the value of all near-by property. Why, therefore, would it not be good business for the Government to render the development of these water powers as attractive as possible? Why is it not manifestly in the public interest that Congress enact such legislation as will encourage men and capital to undertake the development of this great national resource, which would vastly increase the value of the public domain, would increase the national wealth, and would be accomplished without taxation and by private capital?

Under the railroad law of March 3, 1875, any incorporated railroad may obtain free right of way through any of the public lands of the United States merely by filing a map of its proposed line. The same is true for telephone and telegraph lines, and in the oil-producing public-land States for oil pipe lines. These free rights of way are granted because their building is pioneer work often through localities practically uninhabited and because their installation means the development and increased value of the Government lands through which they pass. The development of water power is to an equal extent pioneer work, and of a much more hazardous nature than the building of railroads and installation of telephone and telegraph lines, and the benefits accruing to the public through enhancing the value of the public domain are fully as great, and therefore the Government in the public interest should encourage the development of the now wasting water powers of the country to the fullest extent possible.

The time is ripe to act. Legislators and administrators are taking a broader attitude than ever before. We are ready to make concessions to get good, workable laws. I am glad to note that executive officers seem to be ready to recede from extreme demands. It has been insisted that we should empower executive officers to impose charges on water-power development, to raise revenue and regulate charges to consumers, though I have never been able to figure out how we could benefit the consumer by putting on a tax that he must pay. They are willing to give up these demands. Mr. Merrill and Secretary Lane have testified before the House committee on this important subject. I do not agree entirely with their views, but I can join them on the basis they suggest in order to get a law under which our great resources will be saved from waste in a way most beneficial to our industries and our people. They said:

Mr. MERRILL. This is my position in regard to rental charges: I do not believe in the collection of rental charges primarily for revenue purposes. I do not think it is the best way to obtain revenue, particularly since such a method would impose taxation upon those power users only who happened to obtain power from a project under license. All other power users would be free from the charge or tax. In my judgment there are only two reasons why rental charges should be collected for a license for power development on either a navigable stream or on the public lands. One reason is to collect an amount sufficient at least to pay the cost, direct and indirect, of the administration of water powers under the act and a fair proportion of the cost of administration and protection of the public lands and the national forests.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. That is the only idea in levying this charge.

Mr. MERRILL. And beyond that, under certain circumstances, it may be necessary to go beyond the administrative charge as the only means of getting back to the public excess earnings that can not be reached in any other way. Those are the only two reasons on which I would fix a general rental charge.

Mr. TAYLOR. This bill is drafted on the broad governmental development theory that it is for the welfare of our country to develop this power, to give employment to money and people, and develop our country rather than a system of the peculation of fees out of anybody.

Mr. MERRILL. You are quite right. As far as my opinion goes, it is just this: That except under the unusual circumstances where it is the only way of requiring excess earnings to be divided up, excessive earnings which can not be reached in any other way, we will simply fix a rental charge that will adequately meet the cost of administration such as I have already named, and let the rest go back to the public through reduced rates for the service.

Mr. TAYLOR. So that the public will get the benefit in rate regulation of whatever the Government might otherwise collect as fees?

Mr. MERRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAYLOR. And put into the Federal Treasury?

Mr. MERRILL. I would start with a nominal franchise charge as a basis. This would be applicable to navigable rivers where no Government property is involved. I would increase this somewhat where Government property, such as the public lands or national forests, is also involved, and I would increase it somewhat further where Government property, such as navigation dams upon which Government moneys have been expended, are being used by a licensee. I would not collect charges in any event primarily for general revenue purposes, nor would I fix charges above the amount reasonably necessary to reimburse the Government for those costs of administration which I have already named, which would have the effect either of increasing rates to consumers or of preventing a licensee from earning a fair return upon his investment.

TESTIMONY OF SECRETARY LANE.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is not your idea, is it, Mr. Secretary, that the Government should go into this as a money-making proposition?

Secretary LANE. Not now. I should say that the primary object of any bill of this kind is to help out the people in the neighborhood of the development.

Mr. TAYLOR. To give them——

Secretary LANE (interposing). To give them power instead of coal.

Mr. TAYLOR. To give them the benefit of such rates and service as the developing companies, without having an additional charge put on them for the Federal Treasury, which must necessarily in most cases at last be passed on by the people.

Secretary LANE. Yes. We ought not to make the charge so burdensome that it would increase perceptibly the rate to the people.

Mr. TAYLOR. Is not this true: There are many cases where they now have private enterprises on private lands that are under no Government royalty at all, and when these water-power people develop under this bill, if they have to pay the Government a royalty and compete with those who have to pay no royalty, that can not be passed on to the people, and they have to take it out of their own pockets?

Secretary LANE. That is true.

Mr. TAYLOR. So that in communities where they have that without royalty, where there is that competition, the effect would be the retarding of the development in that community?

Secretary LANE. No; not any royalty.

Mr. TAYLOR. I mean any appreciable royalty. Of course, a royalty merely for supervision—I mean a royalty that would bring money into the Federal Treasury—would retard development where they would have to compete on equal terms with those who have no royalty to pay.

Secretary LANE. I think the making of a royalty that would be unreasonable would be a burden upon the people, making a royalty that would yield some revenue, which is not the primary purpose of the bill.

This thing ought to be said, perhaps, that we ought to more fully appreciate now, during this war, the necessity of larger electrical development than we have ever had before in connection with chemical industries. We are just beginning to understand what electricity can do and what can be done with very high power electrical establishments. We have never been a chemical Nation. That side of our scientific development has been overlooked.

Germany has been the chemical nation of the world. We now are taking that thing up, and probably there is more interest in chemistry in the United States to-day than there ever has been. We have hundreds of chemists in this city to-day in connection with the Bureau of Mines and Ordnance Department. They have been gathered from all parts of the country. A great many of them are Germans, and many of them have been educated in German institutions, showing how far ahead Germany has been in this particular line of science.

It is quite manifest to me that there has got to be very large electrical development if we are going to have the largest use made of our development along lines of chemistry, and perhaps the best sphere for a young man in the next 25 years will be as an electrochemical engineer in the United States.

These powers ought to be put up not only with the idea of taking care of a plant that is known to be a commercially successful proposition but with the purpose also of experimenting and discovering what can be done. So that I would not say that on such a plant as that any kind of a charge should be made by the Government. We ought to foster that kind of thing.

Form a law in substantial accord with those views and we will have done well. A maximum charge practically nominal will provide an ample fund to pay the expenses required and impose no burden upon consumers. Fix this in the law. It is a legislative power and should not be left to administrative agents.

Senators, the development of our water power would make the United States impregnable in time of war, commercially dominant in time of peace.

Impregnable in time of war through furnishing the energy required for production of explosives and munitions, for operation of railroads, and in a thousand ways in the conduct of hostilities, thus releasing our man power for the Army and Navy.

Commercially dominant in time of peace through furnishing energy for industrial activities—electrical and electrochemical processes, for transportation, for agriculture, and for the innumerable things into which the use of power enters in the daily life of our citizens. Power, electric energy, terrible in its war uses, but a God-given blessing when used to promote the comfort of mankind. The safety, the welfare, the prosperity, and the progress of the Nation demand and require the prompt enactment of water-power laws in which protection of the public interest shall be coordinated with fairness toward capital. Every source of power in the United States, whether from steam or water, is being utilized at the present time to utmost capacity to meet demands for explosives, munitions, and war material of all kinds, and yet there is great shortage of electric energy. Munition factories are closed down for lack of it. Practical men say that if the war continues another year the shortage of power will become a serious handicap to success. Congress has delayed the settlement of this question too long. The hour has struck. It should delay no longer. The House should pass a bill soon. If amendatory of ours, it should be sent to conference and our differences harmonized. Let Congress do its duty and do it promptly.

Mr. President, I have two clippings with reference to this matter that I ask permission to insert as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Binghamton Press, Apr. 8, 1918.]

DEVELOP WATER POWER IS CRY OF BUSINESS MEN—VOTE TAKEN BY UNITED STATES CHAMBER OF COMMERCE SHOWS OVERWHELMING MAJORITY IN FAVOR OF USING NATURAL RESOURCES.

WASHINGTON, April 8.

By sweeping majorities, 500,000 business executives who comprise the membership of the United States Chamber of Commerce have adopted resolutions calling on Congress to make provision for harnessing the millions in water horsepower that now run wild.

The vote was taken through the more than 1,000 commercial organizations throughout the country which compose the national chamber. Forty-five States and Alaska and Hawaii participated in the balloting, representing a wide range of industrial interests and opinions, and reliably indicating to Congress how the business men of the Nation look on the water-power situation. Each voting organization cast from 1 to 10 votes, depending on its membership.

The balloting was based on a series of recommendations contained in the report of the committee on water-power development of the United States Chamber of Commerce. These recommendations were presented in the following order:

1. That Federal legislation encouraging the development of water powers should at once be enacted. Adopted by the almost unanimous vote of 1,324 to 6.

2. That authority to grant permits should be vested in an administrative department. Carried by a vote of 1,258 to 17.

3. That the permit period should be at least 50 years, any shorter period being at the applicant's option. In favor 1,216, opposed 42.

4. That tolls should attach only to use of public lands or benefits derived from head-water improvements. Adopted by vote of 1,191½ to 40½.

TO PROTECT PERMITTEES.

5. That permittees should be entitled to acquire the right to use public lands forming only a small and incidental part of the development. Carried by a vote of 1,210 to 25.

6. That recapture should be exercised only upon payment of fair and just compensation. In favor 1,234, opposed 25.

7. That if recapture is not exercised, the investment of the permittee should be adequately protected. Adopted by vote of 1,226 to 26.

8. That rates and service should be regulated by State commissions where the service is interstate, with Federal regulation only where several States are directly concerned and do not agree, or there is no State commission. Carried by a vote of 1,177 to 57.

9. That if any jurisdiction to regulate the issuance of securities is exercised it should be solely by the State. In favor, 1,114; opposed, 117.

10. That no preference should be granted as between applicants amounting to a subsidy from the Government creating unequal competition. Adopted by a vote of 1,191 to 38.

The committee which drew up the report and presented the resolutions was composed as follows:

L. S. Gillette, chairman, engineer and manufacturer, Minneapolis; Harry A. Black, wholesale merchant, Galveston; Rome G. Brown, lawyer, Minneapolis; Henry S. Drinker, president Lehigh University; Frank P. Glass, editor in chief, Birmingham News; E. K. Hall, lawyer, New York City; Horace C. Henry, retired railway contractor, Seattle; Henry L. McCune, lawyer, Kansas City; Samuel V. Stewart, lawyer and banker, Virginia City, Mont., and governor of Montana; George F. Swain, civil engineer, Boston; and C. F. Weed, lawyer and banker, Boston.

HAD ALL DATA AT HAND.

While the committee's report is in itself favorable to positive legislation to enlarge water-power development, every ballot sent out was accompanied by an argument in the negative which clearly and positively set forth objections to the recommendations so that those voting had at hand data on which to base their judgment for or against.

The report begins by pointing out that it is estimated that the undeveloped water power of the country exceeds the total steam power now in service. The Federal Government controls much of the water power resources of the country.

The report continues:

"One of the first things to be clearly perceived is that water-power developments are not exceedingly profitable undertakings earnestly sought by capital as a means of securing large returns on a small investment; but that, on the contrary, steam power is the superior of water power in almost all respects.

"The initial cost of a steam plant is in general but one-half to one-fifth that of a water-power plant of equal capacity. Moreover, a steam plant can be more easily enlarged from time to time and the initial development of a water-power plant must be a larger proportion of the ultimate development than that of a steam plant. The investor in a water-power plant is therefore burdened from the very start with a heavy fixed charge, the failure to meet which may mean bankruptcy.

"Water power will not be developed unless the conditions are made comparatively favorable. Present demand for the development of such power comes, not from capitalists but from communities, which, on account of the high price and scarcity of fuel, are desirous in their own interest, of inducing capital to make such development."

WILL SAVE OTHER RESOURCES.

There are many collateral advantages resulting from the development of water power which are reaped by the community as a whole rather than by the investor. These advantages are the saving of coal and oil, which are exhaustible natural resources and once used can never be replaced, the saving of railroad equipment needed for their transportation, the saving of labor in coal mines and of railroad labor and labor in distribution.

If the water power now commercially capable of development could be brought into use, the savings to the public in the conservation of fuel and the release of labor and railroad equipment would run into hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

At the present moment the public has been made to realize, as never before, the importance of conserving fuel and labor, and the present emergency accentuates the public need of the formulation of a wise and fair water-power policy by the Federal Government.

In order to secure the adequate development of water power it is essential that the subject should be approached with an attitude of mind which recognizes the necessity of making such developments attractive to capital, rather than with that attitude which assumes that such enterprise should be surrounded with as many restrictions as possible.

The conservation of every other natural resource means restriction in its use, for use means consumption and permanent destruction. Every pound of coal burned is forever withdrawn from use. On the other hand, every horsepower of water power not used is lost, and every horsepower conserved and used saves not only the horsepower, but its equivalent in coal and may incidentally improve navigation.

The task of this committee has been, without going into details, to outline the essentials of a fair contract which shall fully protect the interests of the public, and at the same time shall make water-power projects sufficiently attractive to secure their development.

The committee has drawn up an unanimously present certain recommendations regarding the fundamental points which it considers of the greatest importance in a Federal policy if it is to accomplish the highly beneficial results which the public interests demand.

[From the New York Times, New York, Tuesday, April 9, 1918.]

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Now, when waste is almost a crime, the United States is still wasting an enormous energy, an unusual water power which has been estimated at 50,000,000 to 55,000,000 horsepower. The release of coal which a proper development of only an appreciable part of this stored, wasted potential strength would make possible may be imagined. In transportation and industry the work of this neglected magician might have been fruitful beyond belief.

It is of no use to quarrel now with the estimable and virtuous gentlemen who have acted and got Congress to act on the theory that true conservation consists in letting the national treasures sleep unemployed; that everybody in business, and especially every soulless and godless corporation, is a burglar; and that to make money or allow anybody else to make money out of national resources is the unpardonable sin. For the most part the water power has been locked up as if it were Alaska or a murderous lunatic.

War has brought sense, a spirit of conciliation, a certain moderation even among the most transcendental conservationists. So at last two bills dealing with water power on navigable streams and two more relating to the development of water power on public lands have been incorporated as to their best provisions in a bill prepared by the War, Agriculture, and Interior Departments, covering both the hitherto separately considered sides of Federal treatment of water power, and putting the whole water-power jurisdiction in charge of those three departments, the heads thereof constituting a commission for that purpose.

This bill, favored even by Mr. Gifford Pinchot, has been amended and improved. It should be passed, as Secretary Lane says, "speedily to supply power for the war industries of the Nation during the period of fighting to come."

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to enable the President to coordinate, adjust, and utilize the various executive agencies of the Government in order to insure the successful prosecution of the war. To accomplish this end the bill confers upon the President the power to redistribute the functions of all executive agencies, bureaus, and commissions. The bill does not confer upon the President any legislative power. He can not create any new function nor can he abolish any existing function. His power is strictly limited to the right of transfer in order to coordinate, adjust, and utilize. I can see no constitutional objection to this bill. It clearly comes within the war powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution.

That the President at this time should have some power of this nature seems to be universally admitted. To those who maintain that the President already possesses this power and that no additional legislation is necessary, it is a sufficient answer that this question is not free from doubt in the minds of many. To those who maintain that the power granted by this bill is too broad and that the President should specify what changes he wishes to make, it may be said in reply that the very nature of the subject is such that the President can not specify in advance all the changes that may be necessary; and, to my mind, it is impracticable and might prove detrimental to the public interests to oblige the President to come to Congress and ask for legislation in the case of every step he might determine it was wise to take in this reorganization.

There are others who contend that this power should be limited to certain executive agencies, and that especially it should not extend to the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Trade Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission. This objection is based upon the proposition that the President may abuse his power. If this argument is sound, then Congress should at once repeal all the great war powers which it has already vested in the President in order that we might win the war. If the President can not be trusted to exercise the power conferred by this bill in a wise and reasonable way, he can not be trusted to exercise in a wise and reasonable way the other extraordinary powers already given him by Congress, and if this be true, our whole war program will end in failure and dishonor.

I do not share in these forebodings, and I fear no dictatorship or the undermining of our Constitution. I voted for this bill in the committee and I shall vote for it in the Senate, because, above all things, I want to win this war, and because I not only trust our Commander in Chief but I believe that the only way to win this war is for the people and the Congress to cooperate with him so that we may move against the enemy in an organized, invincible unit. It is only by such a heart-to-heart union that we can successfully meet this world crisis and save from threatened destruction law, liberty, and nationality, upon which rest modern civilization and the future progress of the human race.

Mr KELLOGG. Mr. President, I desire to discuss two or three phases of this bill; in the first place, what agencies, administrative boards, commissions, and offices are included within the powers conferred or attempted to be conferred upon the President; second, very briefly, the constitutional power to enact the legislation; and, third, what amendments in my opinion, or at least some of them, should be adopted to the bill, for I am in favor of some of the amendments. The first two questions I shall briefly discuss together.

It has been said that the bill includes all of the executive officers, commissions, and boards; that it only includes those having to do with the war powers; that it does not include the Interstate Commerce Commission; that it does include the Interstate Commerce Commission; that the commission's powers are judicial, and therefore they are not included, and by others that they are administrative and executive. I think the matter is very simple.

There are only three general powers of government—one the legislative, one the judicial, and one the executive. In the broad sense every single officer performing any function of the Government except the judicial and the legislative is an executive officer. All the boards and commissions existing under authority of law having to do with the administration or the execution of law, either in an advisory capacity or to officially execute them, are executive officers, commonly known as administrative officers and administrative boards.

It seems to me that that is perfectly clear. I shall discuss very briefly the description of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Board when I come to those particular commissions.

The next question is whether the Congress has the power to provide for the transfer of executive functions or administrative functions—I use the terms interchangeably and to cover the same general powers—from one officer to another or from one board to another, or whether Congress must specifically in each instance provide from and to what boards the powers are to be transferred.

In construing a legislative act that construction will be given which will make it constitutional if it is possible to do so. If a narrow construction is necessary to make the law constitutional that construction will be given it. If a broad and liberal construction is necessary that construction will be given it. So I think that so far as the general powers are concerned, which Senators desire, I believe unanimously, to give the President, those powers necessary to carry on the war, the courts will limit this act to a transfer of those executive and administrative functions which Congress may by a general act authorize.

I shall not refer in detail to the act. There is no doubt that the creation of these executive functions or executive agencies, the granting of their powers or the transfer of their powers from one board to another, is purely and simply a legislative function. The appointment of the official to execute those powers, of course, is obviously an executive function, and Congress can no more appoint a constitutional officer than the Executive can create power in a board or executive officer.

Congress is not limited in its power of transferring an executive function from one board to another by doing it in a single act specifying the particular power. Congress may by a general act transfer or authorize the transfer of all the powers of certain executive boards and administrative boards or officers to other executive boards, administrative boards, or officers. Congress may also provide that this may be done when and as the President deems it for the public interest; in other words, Congress may pass an act which shall go into effect upon the President finding a particular state of facts, or upon the President stating that he believes the public interest requires that act become operative. Congress may pass an act which may be suspended at the will of the President if, in his opinion, it is for the public interest.

From 1798 to the present time the Congress has passed laws authorizing the President, at his will and whenever he will deem it to be for the public interest, to place an embargo upon any or all of the commerce of the country. Congress has the power of placing the embargo, but it delegated to the President the power to determine when that embargo should go into effect or when an embargo should be suspended. The same rule applies to various acts which the Congress has passed the constitutionality of which has been passed upon by the Supreme Court relative to the tariff laws, and those laws are not confined to become effective when the President has determined a particular state of facts and made a proclamation thereof, but when the President should deem it to be for the public interest.

I ask to have inserted at the end of my remarks excerpts from certain authorities to this effect. I will not weary the Senate by a detailed discussion.

If this act is a law general in its scope whereby Congress determines that there may be a transfer of executive functions which is to go into effect when the President files a written order, as provided therein, then it is constitutional. If, on the other hand, the President is himself legislating and solely authorizing the transfer, then it is unconstitutional. I am inclined to the opinion that as to the transfer of certain functions and powers the courts would hold that Congress had legislated authorizing the transfer and the President had put into force the law when he deemed it for the public interest. That construction would render the bill valid; the other would render it invalid.

There is one other suggestion I desire to make as to the constitutionality of this bill.

It was said, I think by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that under Article II, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution, that it was not within the power of Congress to transfer the duties and obligations of an executive officer who has been confirmed by the Senate to another executive officer.

The constitutional provision is as follows:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not express an opinion. I called attention to that clause, and I presented the query as to whether it could be done and as to whether there were not certainly some major officers that must be confirmed, under this provision, by the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. I thank the Senator for his correction. I believe that was the position of the Senator.

The Supreme Court held, in a decision which I shall ask to have inserted at the end of my remarks, that Congress might create a board to condemn property in the District of Columbia, authorize the President to appoint three members of the board, and provide that the other two members should consist of a District engineer and an engineer of the War Department, although the appointive power was in the President. The court said:

> As, however, the two persons whose eligibility is questioned were at the time of the passage of the act and of their action under it officers of the United States who had heretofore been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, we do not think that because additional duties germane to the offices already held by them were devolved upon them by the act it was necessary that they should be again appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It can not be doubted, and it has frequently been the case, that Congress may increase the power and duties of an existing office without thereby rendering it necessary that the incumbent should be again nominated and appointed.

I ask to have a more extended reference to this case inserted at the end of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KELLOGG. I believe that the President may be authorized by Congress to transfer the duties of one officer who has been confirmed by the Senate to another officer who has been confirmed by the Senate, unless those duties are entirely foreign to the officer to whom they are transferred. I think the statement by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is correct, that if those transfers from one officer to another officer are transfers of duties entirely foreign to those for which he was confirmed, it would violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution; and it may well be that under this provision of the Constitution the Congress could not authorize the President to transfer the duties of a major officer who had been confirmed by the Senate to a minor officer who had never been confirmed. But, generally speaking, as to those executive powers having to do with the management and effectiveness of the war, the various bureaus and commissions and officers of the War and Navy Departments and others, I believe it is within the power of Congress to provide for transfer and leave it to the President to say to what particular officer and to what particular bureau the powers shall be transferred, because when they are transferred those officers do not exercise those powers under the authority of the President. They exercise the powers the Congress has theretofore provided. So that in a general way I believe the powers necessary to the prosecution of the war may under the Constitution be transferred in the general way provided for in this bill. But I do not undertake to say that the President might not attempt to transfer certain powers from one officer to another which would be beyond his constitutional power; but, generally speaking, I believe the powers may be transferred by a general law.

Now I should like to say a few words about the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Board.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, as correctly stated by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], came into being over 30 years ago as the result of a demand by the American people to control those great lines of highway which were absolutely necessary to all the commerce and business of the United States. It was found that to leave the entire avenues of commerce, affecting every individual and every business in the country, to the will of the railroad managers was incompatible with the progress and the stability of the commercial institutions of the country. I am not going to stop to enlarge upon the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission. No commission, no board, no branch of the Government in its executive powers has greater powers than the Interstate Commerce Commission. It has control over the rates of all the billions of commerce moving in this country, the very arteries which keep alive the commercial commonwealth. It has control of rates producing a revenue of over four billions of dollars per annum. Every business pays its tribute to that transportation.

The public is more interested in the relative reasonableness of rates than in the amount of the rate. To be sure, the amount of the rate affects every business, but the competitive conditions of the country make it of the most vital importance that the rates should be relatively reasonable, because Chicago must compete with New York and St. Paul and St. Louis and Kansas City and San Francisco in marketing manufactured and other products; and there has developed in the Interstate Commerce Commission a great body of experts whose business it has been to study the commercial conditions, the rate conditions, the competitive conditions, between different communities, different railroads, different industries, and different parts of the United States. No man could make a general advance or reduction of rates to-day without going to the Interstate Commerce Commission and having that commission investigate and find the relative reasonableness of those rates; for a rate made by an individual not having that knowledge might ruin one industry or one community and build up another.

It is perfectly proper that the President should have, especially while these roads are in the hands of the Government, and especially during this great war emergency, all of the assistance of the various officials and bureaus and experts in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the assistance of the commission itself; and if we have not given him power to use to the fullest extent the entire machinery of the Interstate Commerce Commission, we ought to do so. As a fair illustration of what is being done, let me call your attention to the railroad bill, wherein we provide:

> That the President * * * may avail himself of the advice, assistance, and cooperation of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of the members and employees thereof, and may also call upon any department, commission, or board of the Government for such services as he may deem expedient.

If this is not broad enough—though I think it is—to cover every phase of the assistance that he may require, we ought to make it broad enough. Let me illustrate what he is doing under this very provision.

He has appointed, or the Director General of Railways has appointed, a committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission who are to-day formulating the contracts to be entered into with the individual roads under the guaranty provision of the railroad act, and they are sitting daily and consulting with members of the staff of the Director General of Railways in determining those contracts. This is one illustration.

It is said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and, I believe, by the acting chairman of the committee [Mr. OVERMAN], who has charge of the bill, that the President is not authorized under this bill to take the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and transfer them to the Director General of Railways, because, the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Delaware say, the functions of the commission are judicial and not executive or administrative.

I shall not take much time to discuss that question. I have before me a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States—and it has been reaffirmed and cited over and over again—that the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission are administrative and executive. The two terms mean the same thing. "Administrative" is the more popular term used to designate those boards and bureaus and commissions which administer the details of a great system like this.

The court said in the Reagan case, which I will ask to have inserted at the end of my remarks:

> It is doubtless true as a general proposition that the formation of a tariff of charges for the transportation by a common carrier of persons or property is a legislative or administrative rather than a judicial function—

And that it can not be conferred upon the courts.

Why, to be sure, after the commission has fixed a rate or made a regulation, if it is such as to deny the railroads reasonable compensation and confiscate their property within the meaning of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the court may enjoin it, and the reasonableness of that particular rate which has been fixed and has gone into effect may then become a judicial question; but there is not a board in Washington, there is not a commission in Washington, that is not an administrative or executive one, that is not both and that does not come within the general designation of this law. I am very glad that that is true, because the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is undoubtedly correct in saying that this bill is confined to the transfer of executive functions. I do not agree with him, however, in his suggestion that an advisory board in the War Department is not an executive or administrative board. Although that advisory board may not itself perform the act, the advice it gives is in pursuance of an executive or administrative power.

Mr. President, there can not be any question that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Board come within the terms of the act. As I said to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], if they are not within the terms of the act, then of course there can not be any objection to excepting them; at least I can not see any. I do not for a moment believe that the President intends to transfer the duties and functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I do not believe it is possible for him to administer the railways without the use and assistance of a trained body of men and their employees, such as the commission represents, which has grown up with 30 years of experience; but I do not believe that relieves us from the responsibility under the law of excepting the commission.

Mr. President, I was a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce which considered the railroad bill, and for five weeks the committee took testimony, listened to the representatives of commercial organizations and industries from all parts of the country. The testimony of those men, not only engaged in great industries but in the small industries from all parts of the country, urged us to maintain the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission not only in fixing the rates and fares but in establishing the classification of rates, and in all matters pertaining to the regulation of rates, fares, and charges.

The bill was reported to the Senate, thoroughly discussed, and the Congress, against the urgent request of the Director General of Railways, insisted on maintaining the ultimate power of the commission over the question of rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices under which the commerce of the country is to be carried on.

I see no reason, I have found no reason in the last two months to change my attitude upon that question. I believe that the work of the commission, while not perfect, has been of inestimable value to the people of this country, because all the commerce and all the business of the country is now in this day of rapid communication dependent to a great extent upon transportation rates and regulations.

I do not believe that any one man, much less the Director of Railways, who is burdened with other duties, could perform this function to the satisfaction of the American people, try as he might. In conceding his devotion to the public service and his great ability, I believe that this body, consisting of a trained and experienced commission, gives the American people confidence that their rights will be respected, and I believe that the commission should be excepted from the extraordinary powers of this bill.

A few words as to the Federal Reserve Board. I believe everyone realizes the importance of our financial system. It is the bulwark of all industry and enterprise. With a sound financial system the business of the country will be prosperous and stable. With an unsound financial system the opposite is the case. History admonishes us that there is no time in the life of nations when it is so important to have a sound financial basis as in time of war. Napoleon, the greatest military as well as one of the greatest administrative geniuses of the world, found it necessary to carry on the great Napoleonic wars to have a sound financial system, and he abolished the financial system of France at one stroke and established in its stead the Bank of France, carrying on all the Napoleonic wars without borrowing a dollar or leaving a public debt to the nation.

Lloyd-George said the nation that could raise the last million of dollars would win this war. This is not a war of men alone; it is a war of commercial enterprise, financial power, where all must exert their ability, not only in war but in commerce and production, and there has never been a time when it was more important to intrust our finances to an independent board than it is to-day.

The reserve banking system was created to strengthen our banking and financial system. It was made as independent and as strong as Congress could make it. In selecting the Reserve Board the President was required to appoint only one member from any reserve district, giving due regard to the industrial and commercial conditions of the country and geographical considerations. The members of the board were paid a large salary, $12,000. The appointment covered a period of 10 years, in order that no one administration or no one President could in his term appoint the entire board.

We have created a Finance Corporation, but Congress took pains to see that it had a separate independent board of directors. It certainly is not in the interests of the country that the Reserve Board should loan money to business institutions of the country. They are required to devote their entire time to the banking business, and it is essential that they should be separate from the other industries of the country.

This Federal banking system, I believe it is claimed by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, is one of the most far-reaching and important pieces of legislation ever enacted by the American Congress. In fact, so fervent were many of the orators praising this wonderful piece of legislation, that it was said when the war broke out that although the act was not then in effect the very anticipation of it stilled the troubled waters of the world's finance. If it was important to maintain the Federal Reserve System separate from the other departments of the Government at the beginning of the world war in 1914, it is doubly so now.

I do not believe that the President would merge the Federal Reserve Board with any of the other administrative or executive boards of the country, but the responsibility for creating that financial system was not in the Executive. The responsibility was upon Congress, and the responsibility to-day, as to whether we will preserve it and preserve the Interstate Commerce Commission, or any of the other boards administering the affairs of this country, is upon Congress, and we can not evade it.

I for one am not willing to abolish the function of the Interstate Commerce Commission nor to give anyone the power to do it. I do not believe that that is necessary to carry on the war. I do not believe that it is necessary in the case of the Federal Reserve Board, and I do not believe that I can shirk the responsibility or place it upon anyone else.

Mr. President, as I said before, if properly construed, I believe that in the coordination of the activities of the Government or its executive agencies, boards and bureaus having to do with the war, the bill is a constitutional exercise of legislative power, and I believe that it is necessary and advisable that many of these agencies be consolidated and that the duties of some be transferred elsewhere. The bill certainly is an extraordinary piece of legislation.

I agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that if we are to win this war the utmost confidence and cooperation between the executive and legislative departments must exist; that the legislative department must be in harmony with the executive department; and that the sympathy, good will, and indomitable spirit of the entire American people must be enlisted. If this war is to be won, we must tell the truth to the American people. It can not be done by painting rosy pictures, without foundation, or by the dreams of optimists. It must be won by first fully realizing the task and then by bringing to that task all the resources, energies, inventive genius, commercial and financial power, and patriotism of the American people. This undoubtedly is a remarkable piece of legislation, and I think it would have been wiser if the President and the executive departments of the Government had been perfectly frank with Congress and given it a general idea, with as much detail as possible, of the objects it desired to accomplish. I realize that all of the details could not probably have been given, but it could easily have been said whether or not it was desired to transfer the duties of the Department of Justice, the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the Federal Reserve Board, or some of the other boards of the Federal Government. But that course has not been pursued, and I do not think that failure should relieve us of the responsibility of granting the power if there is any reasonable ground to believe that it is necessary or advisable in carrying on the war.

Sir, with the fate of all the democracies of the world hanging in the balance; with the Huns hammering at the gates of Europe; with the issue of the greatest battle of all time yet undecided, I am not going to be too particular or too hesitant in granting all the powers I believe can be administered to advantage in carrying on this war; but I can not believe that it is necessary to grant the power to change many of the civil branches of this Government, which the experience of the lawmakers of the people and of time have demonstrated to be useful instruments of government.

APPENDIX.

In the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 680) the court had under consideration the validity of a tariff act to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing certain articles. It, in substance, provided that whenever the President should be satisfied that the Government of any country producing certain articles was discriminating against this country, he could, by proclamation, state the facts and suspend the law admitting said articles free of duty, and during such suspension duties should be levied and collected thereon.

The question was whether this was conferring judicial powers upon the President. The court held that it was not. The opinion was written by Mr. Justice Harlan, in the course of which he traced the history of such legislation from 1798 down to the time of the decision.

It is unnecessary to go through these decisions and precedents, but in substance the court held that it was within the power of Congress to confer upon the President the power to put in force a statute or to suspend a statute, at his discretion, when in his opinion the public interest demanded it, levying taxes, creating an embargo on commerce, providing for duties on imports, etc.

One of the first cases was the brig Aurora, 7 Cranch 382, involving the validity of the nonintercourse act of March 1, 1809. The act forbade the importation after May 20, 1809, of goods, wares, or merchandise from any port of Great Britain or France, provided that "the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized in case either France or Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts as they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, to declare the same by proclamation," after which the trade suspended by that act and the act allowing an embargo could "be renewed with the nation so doing."

It is also held that acts of Congress may be suspended or put in force upon the discretion of the President, when in his judgment it is for the public interest. During the administration of Washington Congress, by an act approved June 4, 1794 (ch. 41), authorized the President, when Congress was not in session, and for a prescribed period—

"whenever, in his opinion, the public safety shall so require, to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States, or upon the ships and vessels of the United States, or the ships and vessels of any foreign nation, under such regulations as the circumstances may require, and to continue or revoke the same whenever he shall think proper." (1 Stat., 372.)

Subsequently, an act approved February 9, 1799, provided:

"That at any time after the passing of this act it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States, by his order, to remit and discontinue for the time being the restraints and prohibitions aforesaid, either with respect to the French Republic, or to any island, port, or place belonging to the said Republic, with which a commercial intercourse may safely be renewed; and also to revoke such order whenever, in his opinion, the interest of the United States shall require; and he shall be, and hereby is, authorized to make proclamation thereof accordingly." (684–685.)

It was made unlawful to import, from November 15, 1806, into Ireland, or any of the colonies or dependents of Great Britain, certain articles. The operation of this act was suspended by a subsequent act of December 19, 1806, until July 1, 1807. The last act contained the following section:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized further to suspend the operation of the aforesaid act if, in his judgment, the public interest should require it: Provided, That such suspension shall not extend beyond the second Monday in December next." (685.)

"By an act concerning discriminating duties of tonnage and impost, approved January 7, 1824, chapter 4, section 4, it was provided that upon satisfactory evidence being given to the President of the United States by the government of any foreign nation that no discriminating duties of tonnage or impost are imposed or levied within the ports of the said nation, upon vessels wholly belonging to citizens of the United States, or upon merchandise, the produce or manufacture thereof, imported in the same, the President is hereby authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the foreign discriminating duties of tonnage and impost within the United States are, and shall be, suspended and discontinued, so far as respects the vessels of the said nation, and the merchandise of its produce or manufacture, imported into the United States in the same; the said suspension to take effect from the time of such notification being given to the President of the United States, and to continue so long as the reciprocal exemption of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and merchandise as aforesaid, thereon laden, shall be continued, and no longer." (686–687.)

Many other acts are referred to in this opinion.

In the case of Shoemaker v. The United States, 147 U. S., 282, the Supreme Court had under consideration the validity of an act of Congress creating a park commission for condemnation of land in the District of Columbia. The act provided that certain members should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate and that other members should consist of officers in the service of the United States who had previously been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The officers who were to become members of the board who were not to be reappointed were the Chief Engineers of the United States Army and the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia. The court said:

"There are several features that are pointed to as invalidating the act. The first is found in the provision appointing two members of the park commission, and the argument is, that while Congress may create an office, it can not appoint the officer; that the officer can only be appointed by the President with the approval of the Senate and that the act itself defines these park commissioners to be public officers, because it prescribes that three of them are to be civilians, to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate. This, it is said, is equivalent to a declaration by Congress that the three so sent to the Senate are 'officers,' because the Constitution provides only for the nomination of 'officers' to be sent to the Senate for confirmation; and that it hence follows that the other two are likewise 'officers,' whose appointment should have been made by the President and confirmed by the Senate. As, however, the two persons whose elegibility is questioned were at the time of the passage of the act and of their action under it officers of the United States who had heretofore been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, we do not think that, because additional duties, germane to the offices already held by them, were devolved upon them by the act, it was necessary that they should be again appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It can not be doubted, and it has frequently been the case, that Congress may increase the power and duties of an existing office without thereby rendering it necessary that the incumbent should be again nominated and appointed.

"It is true that it may be sometimes difficult to say whether a given duty, devolved by statute upon a named officer, has regard to the civil or military service of the United States. Wales v. Whitney, 114 U. S., 564, 569; Smith v. Whitney, 116 U. S., 167, 179, 181. But in the present case the duty which the military officers in question were called upon to perform can not fairly be said to have been dissimilar to, or outside of the sphere of, their official duties."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to offer an amendment, if I may. Does the Senator from Massachusetts wish to speak to the general bill?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. If any Senator wishes to speak to the general bill, I will not offer any amendment now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts has already addressed himself to the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I am addressing myself to the bill, not to an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I say the Senator from Massachusetts has addressed himself to the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I have.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Already.

Mr. LODGE. Already? I was not aware of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not very long, however.

Mr. LODGE. I was not aware of it. I thought I was speaking on an amendment when I spoke before.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The record so shows. There was no amendment pending. The Senator did not speak very long.

Mr. LODGE. I can very easily wait and speak on an amendment; but I thought when I did speak—which was very briefly—that I spoke on an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not keep the record personally. It is kept at the desk.

Mr. LODGE. The clerks at the desk probably know better than I do, but I was not aware of it. I should like to ask, just for curiosity, if it is because I asked the Senator from New York a question that I am debarred from speaking on the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will have to look up the record.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to make a statement, I happened to be in the chair at the time. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] was concluding his remarks. I had nodded to him as an indication that his time was about to expire. The Senator from Massachusetts rose and said he would like to ask the Senator from New York a question. The Senator from Massachusetts had observed my action. The Senator from New York said, "My time has expired." The Senator from Massachusetts said, "I will ask the question in my own time."

Mr. LODGE. Then I did take the floor, and I am debarred from speaking on the bill again. I hope, Mr. President, the rule will be enforced with equal severity on every one else.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be if the Chair can ascertain when a Senator has spoken.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I do not take the floor for the purpose of discussing the possibilities under this bill, or what may be done in the event it should become a law. I merely want to call the attention of the Senate to what I believe to be one of the causes for the lamentable situation which now confronts us; and, as it involves a suggestion which probably will meet with the more or less emphatic disapproval of my colleagues, I shall be very brief.

The Senator in charge of the pending measure, the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], has very freely and very frankly stated to the Senate the reasons why he expects the support of his colleagues. The Senate will remember that at the very opening of his remarks he stated most emphatically that the governmental machinery in the executive departments was loose and was shaky; that it lacks lubrication; that it contained a monkey wrench and ran rusty; and later on he stated that it permitted gross duplication of work, with gross attendant extravagance and inefficiency; that it was, on the whole, the most unscientific system in the world.

I want to read the exact language of the Senator from North Carolina, because it seems to me that words more graphic or more accurate could not be found to express the existing situation:

He—

does not want new laws or any substantive power, but he wants the authority simply to redistribute these functions so that he may coordinate the great machinery of this Government, which is now loose, with a monkey wrench in it, with no lubricating oil, and running rusty.

Mr. President, other Senators from time to time have dropped similar suggestions, but not one of them has dared to intimate that his views were shared by the Chief Executive. All doubt upon that subject is now removed. The Senator from North Carolina speaks with authority. This bill is the President's bill, and we may and must assume that the reasons which the Senator from North Carolina has urged upon the Senate are precisely the reasons which the President urged upon him and which persuaded him to introduce this bill and stand responsible for it before the Senate. It is now admitted by all concerned that the governmental machinery in the executive departments is loose, that it contains at least one monkey wrench, that it lacks lubrication, that it is running rusty, that it permits gross duplication of work, with great attendant extravagance and inefficiency, and that it is, on the whole, the most unscientific system in the world.

Mr. President, this being the admitted situation to-day with regard to the executive machinery of the Government, I tremble when I consider the possible consequences of further delay in removing the obstructions that now block its operations. I tremble when I contemplate the possible consequences that may result because of the time that has been already lost. There is nothing in language that can describe existing conditions in the world to-day. There is nothing in language that can measure the iniquities of the men who are responsible for those conditions. We have been slow to believe that there were great civilized nations who love a lie better than the truth and cruelty better than mercy; but we must believe it, and because this is true, we are facing the probable necessity of sending one, two, three, four, five millions of American boys 3,000 miles across the water to restore the world to peace and justice and sanity.

We may all lack wisdom, but it seems to me that those of us who advocated preparedness three years ago and marched in preparedness parades had a keener insight into the possibilities of the future than those who told us that we were prepared for any emergencies that might happen; that it was our duty to remain neutral in thought as well as in deed; that the war was no concern of ours; and that the only peace to be considered was a peace without victory.

Mr. President, the Chief Executive has been now in office more than five years. During all that time war has been a possibility. During the last three years of that time war with Germany has been a probability, and during the last year it has been a fact. Yet the President through his authorized spokesman, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, comes to Congress to-day and tells us that his machine for waging war is rusty; that it contains a monkey wrench; that it is loose; that it lacks lubrication and is, on the whole, the most unscientific machine in the world.

It seems to me, Mr. President, it is time that this machine was put in order, and I feel it to be my duty to help in every possible way. I should be glad if the President would permit Congress to assist him. It would be much better if he would take Congress into his confidence to a degree that might be effective and safe in the premises, but he declines to do that.

We are informed by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that if this machine is put in order at all it must be done by the President, and it is clear to me that it must be done by some one and done at once. If any Member of this body can suggest any other instrumentality that can accomplish this object I shall be glad to listen to him and, if possible, assist, but no Member on this floor has suggested any other instrumentality, for none other exists.

Whatever may be my pride of opinion in this hour, it seems to me it is my duty to subordinate it to the interests of my country. I find no constitutional obstacle in the way of my advocacy of this measure.

Anyone who is at all familiar with the history of this country must know that the single factor which compelled the ratification of the Constitution of the United States by the unwilling States was the necessity of being able to present a united front against the common enemy. If I had to choose between losing the Constitution and saving the flag I would save the flag, but I am driven to no such alternative. The Constitution is just as much a part of the flag as are its stars and stripes, and when I am saving the flag I am saving the Constitution. I do not mean by that that Congress should abdicate its legislative power to the Executive. That is not necessary, and it does not seem to me that it is in any way contemplated in this bill.

I do believe that Congress has full authority to confer upon the Executive a power in the exercise of which he shall have a discretion wide enough to put his war-making machine into working order, and I can conceive of no power that is broad enough to permit and accomplish this that will not be broad enough to permit abuses. I can not cast my vote upon the theory that the President of the United States is going to act unwisely or unpatriotically. If I did I should find myself unable to vote in favor of any of the pending measures, and I think Congress would very soon find itself in a position where it would be unable to act at all.

I know it has been urged, Mr. President, that the Interstate Commerce Commission should not, by implication even, be included within the operation of this law. That argument does not appeal to me. It seems to me that the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to act in harmony with the Director General of Railroads. I listened to the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who is the guardian angel of that commission, and a most effective and eloquent one, but I am not guileless enough to believe that that commission will, under existing conditions, decline to do anything that the Director General of Railroads wants it to do or do anything he does not want it to do.

I hold that same opinion with regard to the Federal Reserve Board. I listened to the dire forebodings of the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] of the possible disasters that might happen if the functions of that board were disturbed by the Chief Executive, but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the President of the United States can beggar the American people now and give the victory to the sword of the Huns if he desires. He has power enough.

I believe that the Federal Reserve Board will act in harmony with the Secretary of the Treasury and the President. I can conceive nothing that would be more fatal than that they should act in discord and conflict, provided they act wisely, and I must assume that they will.

So, Mr. President, I see nothing for myself to do but to vote for this bill and hope that the President of the United States, now that he realizes that his pen, however mighty it may have seemed to be to him and his friends, has utterly failed to secure peace without victory, will take the sword in his right hand and use it. I hope that he will remove the monkey wrenches from the executive machine and put in their places men who by reason of their training and their natural faculties have demonstrated their ability to do things and do them right.

That brings me, Mr. President, to the suggestion which at the opening of my remarks I hinted would be very cooly received by my colleagues. At the same time it seems to me that I am justified in calling it to the attention of the Senate at this time.

On the 18th of June, 1917, I introduced a bill entitled "A bill granting privilege of the floor and right to participate in debate to heads of executive departments and other officers." Had this bill been written into the statute books last summer it is my opinion that the pending bill would have been requested by the President long ago, if at all. While Senators are looking for defects in the pending bill it would seem to be worth while to examine with great care the system that has rendered it necessary and if possible discover the real and primary cause of existing conditions.

What we need is prevention of errors and delays in executive departments in the future; there is little profit in regrets or censure; and if the pending bill is necessary it must be admitted that somebody has lost valuable time. The danger of losing more time must be apparent to everyone, and I think it is our first duty to ascertain how much of this loss is due to individuals, and how much, if any, to the system under which lack of accomplishment in time of stress seems to be the rule rather than the exception. It is my opinion that the fault is not in the machine, but in our failure to keep it in order and use it as the men who made it intended it should be used.

The men who composed the Constitutional Convention and framed that historic instrument, having before their eyes the sorry fate of those who trust in degenerate kings or ignorant majorities, endeavored to establish a Government that would prevent disaster at the hands of either. They gave to the Executive the power to veto an act of Congress, and to each House the power to veto the action of the other House; and they gave to an independent judiciary the power to nullify acts of the legislative branch of the Government unauthorized by the Constitution. Take it altogether our is a governmental machine that will never be improved upon, in my opinion. But it is, nevertheless, a machine that must be intelligently operated if satisfactory results are to be obtained. I can see no reason why the executive and legislative branches should antagonize each other, especially when the Nation is fighting for its life. It would seem to me to be a time when each branch should keep the other informed of its purposes and be quick to welcome good advice and correct errors. There is nothing in the system which forbids intelligent cooperation between those who make and those who execute the laws. There is nothing in the system which forbids an economical expenditure of the people's money or the very wisest possible organization, concentration, development, and exercise of the fighting strength of the Nation. The executive and legislative branches were not rendered independent for the purpose of enabling them to conceal their errors from each other. On the contrary, it was expected that each would serve to hasten wise decisions and restrain ill-considered and hasty action on the part of the other.

We know that the duties of the Executive have greatly increased in recent years. With the phenomenal growth of the Nation in population and wealth and the enormous combinations of capital engaged in interstate commerce demanding regulation and oversight beyond the jurisdiction and powers of the States, the people have been compelled to look to the Federal Government for protection against monopoly and extortion. The Chief Executive, being the one official voted for by all the people, is naturally expected to impress upon Congress the will of the people expressed at the polls. It is the constitutional right of the President to recommend legislation, and he can greatly add to his prestige and popularity if his messages indicate uncomprising hostility toward predatory wealth.

To-day the Chief Executive can command as well as advise; and in a time of national peril like the present, when patriotic men must forget their partisanship, he easily secures autocratic power over the lives and fortunes of the people. But his purposes, however commendable, must be carried into effect by the heads of the executive departments, and they, in turn, must depend upon the wisdom and skill of their subordinates. The President's Cabinet, therefore, a body of men unrecognized by the Constitution, becomes, in time of war, the real and actual sovereign, or combination of sovereigns, to whose administration of the law the people must bow. These men are not elected by the people. They are responsible to the President only. At the present time we have 10 or more separate and distinct executive departments in charge of 10 so-called members of the Cabinet. To this list we must add the Fuel Administrator, the Food Administrator, the Director General of Railroads, the Tariff Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, and many other officers of lesser notoriety but of equal importance. Why should it not be the duty, as well as the privilege, of these men to come before the Congress upon certain days in each week and render an account of their stewardship? Would it not tend to eliminate incompetency, misunderstandings, and antagonisms both in the making and the administration of the laws? Would it not tend to enable the people to put the responsibility for maladministration and mallegislation where it belongs? What reason is there for continuing methods that must drive the executive and legislative departments further and further apart until, in the very necessities of the situation, the one must entirely succumb to the other or force a deadlock?

With the ever-increasing extension of Federal control over the vast and complicated industrial and social interests of the Nation, is it wise that executive officers should be directly responsible to no one but the man who selects them?

The people look to the President in large matters. They elect him and trust him to deal with the great principles in which they are interested; but if their money is squandered or their industries are crippled by unwise and arbitrary regulations instituted by men in subordinate positions, they do not complain to the President. They write to their Representative or Senator and expect him to secure relief. I will not dwell upon the recent unsatisfactory experiences of myself and colleagues in this particular phase of our service, but it is my belief that had it been the duty of the Fuel Administrator to come before the Senate and announce and defend his purposes and plans for the conservation of coal he would have been less likely to have issued orders in clear violation of the law and more likely to have granted the reasonable request of the Senate to postpone action until his intentions, wise or otherwise, had been intelligently considered and discussed.

Will not the privilege of the floor and the duty to defend an administrative policy before either or both branches of Congress add greatly to the dignity and reputation of a competent executive officer, and will it not necessitate the retirement of an incompetent one? Will it not tend to compel the selection by the President of the ablest men in the country especially trained and fitted for the work in hand? Has not the time gone by when these positions of grave and high responsibility can safely be filled with personal friends or territorially eligible contributors to the campaign fund? Is there any reason why the Secretary of War should be entirely ignorant of military matters? Is there any reason why the Secretary of the Navy should not be a sailor? I do not say this in criticism of the present incumbents. This administration has followed the custom that has been in vogue for years, but when we realize, as we must some day, that this colossal industrial and social corporation, composed of 48 separate political sovereignties, must be run economically and wisely if it is to remain solvent and successful, we shall insist that the business of governing be run on business principles in times of war as well as in times of peace.

Objections to inviting or requiring heads of the executive departments to defend their purposes and plans in the Senate and the House largely center in the fear that the experiment will serve only to add force to Executive programs.

It is asserted that during the past 20 years we have had constant opportunity to observe the ease with which opposition to the legislative plans of the Chief Executive is removed.

It is said, and with some force, that Congress has become a mere sounding board to echo the will of the President. It is said that if Congress sometimes wisely amends laws drawn and presented by department officials, if Congress sometimes succeeds in securing the removal of absurdities and dangerous provisions, and for this service deserves the everlasting gratitude and confidence of the people, it never gets it. On the contrary, if Congress dares to stop a bill long enough to look it over carefully it will be censured rather than praised by the people and the press for its stupid interference with the benign will of the "people's choice." If this is the state of things to-day, how can it be intensified? How can you add to an already irresistible force? Is it not probable that if executive officers are required to defend their plans and purposes before Congress, amendments will be more easily obtained and unwise measures more easily blocked than under a method which tends to remove these officials from all responsibility to Congress?

If we dread and regret the constanty increasing power of the Cabinet and other officials, is it not, after all, our own fault? If we doubt the need and the wisdom of the constant increase in the number of executive departments and bureaus, we must remember that if a mistake is made in this regard it is ours and not the President's. In my opinion, it is not a mistake if these departments are wisely and economically administered. These new executive branches are demanded by the economic necessities of the people. They are as vital to our national growth as are new branches to the growth of a tree. But these departments and bureaus are created by Congress, and they are and should be subject to the will of Congress.

There are more than 500 of us in the Senate and House, and we are commissioned by the American people to see that the executive offices we create are properly administered. Certainly we ought not to be afraid to compel an official whose office can be abolished by us at any moment to come before us and answer questions if he can.

It seems to me that the bill which I introduced last summer is worthy of our careful consideration. It follows the method which the experience of other nations has proved to be of the greatest value and it promises the only safeguard against a continuation of existing conditions that is now in sight. Our executive departments to-day are intrenched behind closed doors, which can be opened only by a resolution of Congress, and then only far enough to allow a congressional committee to inquire into the mistakes that have been made. I repeat, what is needed is prevention of errors rather than their punishment. If we are to perform our mission as the great and good Nation at home and abroad, we must be the wise Nation. We can not rid ourselves of the good or evil that lies in giving the last word to the majority, but we must, if we are wise, invite and welcome and support in every way the right of the minority to test the schemes of the majority and so prevent unintentional but grave mistakes, the bitter consequences of which will be suffered by all.

I have said all I care to say at this time. As far as I have been able to observe, students of the subject, outside of political officialdom, believe the experiment would be wholly beneficial if tried. The latest expression I have noticed is that of President Butler, of Columbia College, and I ask permission to print a brief extract from his address delivered in St. Louis, Mo., on the 16th of February last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BECKHAM in the chair). Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The business of national government has become so huge and so complex that the sharp separation of the executive and the legislative powers to which we have been accustomed for 140 years is now distinctly disadvantageous. It brings in its train lack of coherence and of continuity in public policy; it conceals from the people much that they should know; and it prevents effective and quick cooperation between the Congress and the executive departments, both in times of emergency and in the conduct of the ordinary business of government. There is a way to overcome these embarrassments and difficulties without in any way altering the form of our Government or breaking down the wise safeguards which the Constitution contains. That is to provide by law, as may be done very simply, that the members of the Cabinet shall be entitled to occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives, with the right to participate in debate on matters relating to the business of their several departments, under such rules as the Senate and House, respectively, may prescribe. Such an act should further provide that the members of the Cabinet must attend sessions of the Senate and House of Representatives at designated times, in order to give information asked by resolution or to reply to questions which may be propounded to them under the rules of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Had such a provision been in force during the past generation, the Nation would have been spared many an unhappy and misleading controversy. What has sometimes been made public only after the labor and cost of an elaborate investigation by committees might have been had without delay through the medium of questions put to a Cabinet officer on the floor of the Senate or the House of Representatives. No feature of British parliamentary practice is more useful or contributes more to a public understanding of what the executive is doing than the proceedings at question time in the House of Commons. A Cabinet officer is in a much more dignified position if he is permitted to answer questions as to his official conduct and business on the floor of a legislative body and to make his reply part of the public record than if he is interrogated in a committee room as an incident in some general inquiry. Perhaps no single step would do as much as this to restore public interest in congressional debates, to promote administrative efficiency, and to bring about a just and proper intimacy between the legislative representatives of the people and the people's chief executive agents.

This is not a new question or one unsupported by high authority; but, unfortunately, it had never been pressed to a successful issue. The classic document on the subject is the report of a select committee submitted to the Senate of the United States on February 4, 1881. That report accompanied and discussed a bill containing the provisions just mentioned and also outlined certain rules to be adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives in order to make the provisions of the proposed bill effective. This report was a unanimous one and was signed by Senators belonging to each of the two great political parties. They are men whose names carry great weight. The signatures are those of Senators Pendleton, of Ohio; Allison, of Iowa; Voorhees, of Indiana; Blaine, of Maine; Butler, of South Carolina; Ingalls, of Kansas; Platt, of Connecticut; and Farley, of California.

The bill which those Senators reported 37 years ago should now be revived and enacted. Their report discussed in elaborate detail both the advantages of the proposed measure and the possible objections to it, including those which might be raised on constitutional grounds. That representative committee argued with convincing force that if, by a line of precedents since the organization of the Government, the Congress has established its power to require the heads of departments to report to it directly, and also its power to admit persons to the floor of either House to address it, it would seem to be perfectly clear that the Congress may require the report to be made or the information to be given by the heads of departments on the floor of the Houses, publicly and orally.

Were such a custom to be established an almost certain result would be the selection as heads of the great executive departments of men of large ability and personal force, men able to explain and to defend their policies and measures before the Congress of the United States in the face of the whole country. It would also follow that the Nation's Legislature would be enabled to exercise a more intelligent and a more effective control over the executive departments than is now the case, as well as to render them more intelligent and more effective aid, in the form both of appropriations and of positive law.

Nothing would appear to stand in the way of this most desirable advance except our national political inertia, which always serves as a powerful obstacle to proposed political reforms. At the present moment, when the Nation is making an unprecedented effort and when Congress is providing for loans and for taxes that are colossal in amount, and when new problems of far-reaching importance are constantly arising, it would be an inestimable public advantage were such a relation between the heads of the executive departments and the two Houses of Congress already established and in force.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in at the conclusion of section 1 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 1, page 2, line 19, the following proviso:

Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall not extend to the functions, duties, or powers of the Federal Reserve Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. GUION. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], is absent this morning because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we have heard lately from Senators impatient to pass bills, also from the press, and most recently from the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], of the delays of Congress. The fact is that the people in administrative positions, who have been delaying and who have really made the delays, being in possession of all the channels of publicity and in control of the press associations, find it convenient to lay the blame for their own shortcomings upon Congress. The real truth about Congress has been pretty well given and the facts have been spread upon the records here, but they have not been, and probably will not be, presented to the country in any form by the press.

The last session of Congress passed, I think, a greater amount of important legislation than any Congress which has ever been held in this country, or, I might say, than any great parliamentary body. I will not rehearse the list; it is in the record and we all know it. The same is true of this session. The measures essential for the conduct of the war—that is, the measures without which the executive officers could not operate—of course, were the money measures, and the bills appropriating money, all that was asked—the bills authorizing loans to supply the money—were passed with the greatest possible rapidity. There never has been a moment when any department or any officer, high or low, could say that they had not been furnished with money by Congress. The great bill levying taxes, of course, took time in its consideration. That was inevitable. You can not pass a bill like that with rapidity. It was a bill which necessarily gave rise to many controversies and many difficult questions. We passed, also, many other bills with what seemed to me at the time and to many other Senators undue rapidity, and we are now reaping our reward in being compelled to amend them. The espionage bill was rushed through here. It was thought to be very much delayed; but it was really passed, in my opinion, under great pressure, and we have since had to pass two bills to amend it. We rushed through—this I know, because it came from the Finance Committee—the insurance bill in the closing days of the last session, and we have had to pass one or two more bills since then to amend it; and now, if I am correctly informed, there are many amendments to that act still pending.

Mr. SMOOT. There are three such bills now pending.

Mr. LODGE. There are three such bills now pending, the Senator from Utah informs me. There is no gain in legislating in that way. Bills are prepared for us almost entirely outside of Congress. They come in here from the departments with bills improperly, crudely, and hastily prepared, and if they are not immediately passed the cry goes up that Congress is delaying the war. Delays come through the people who make the bills, and who make them badly.

Even with all the care which was taken in the consideration of the revenue bill, many amendments of it are asked for. If we had not worked under quite such heavy pressure the necessity for some of those amendments would have been avoided.

Here is the housing bill, which my excellent friend from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], to whom I am much attached, is very impatient about. It is said we must pass it at once; that Congress is holding up all the work. We knew six months ago—indeed, we knew last summer—that the housing was needed; that was perfectly well known; and yet they have been six months getting a bill ready, and then they come in here and raise the cry that Congress is delaying the war because it is taking less days than the departments have months to consider the bill. Indeed, we have already passed one bill appropriating $50,000,000 for that purpose.

The delays are not here; they never have been here. The only bills which have been debated at length have been bills not concerned directly with men or arms or munitions, but bills concerned with the business of the people of the United States and their daily life. Those are the bills which have taken time; some of them have taken some weeks of debate, and it is very natural that they should have done so. Where our whole business system is being revolutionized and where our homes and everything else are to be taken and our daily life is to be interfered with in every possible way, it is inevitable, and only right, that such bills should receive proper consideration.

But, Mr. President, what I say about it and the pointing out of these facts that can not be denied are useless, because the people who are to blame control the channels of publicity; they have the funds of the Government behind them; and they can give broadcast to the country any impression they please.

I am not going to take such time as I have left to argue the constitutional or legal aspects of this bill. That question has been argued very ably and very fully by some of the most distinguished lawyers of the Senate and by some not so distinguished; but it has been thoroughly argued. I wish to call attention to certain objections which have been made to what seem to me to be reasonable amendments, which offer no sufficient cause for some of the excitement which has been displayed. The President, with his usual felicity of phrase, said in his letter to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in referring to what is known as the court-martial bill:

> It would put us nearly upon the level of the very people we are fighting and affecting to despise.

Probably it is owing to my own slowness of apprehension, but I am not perfectly clear about "affecting to despise." The American people, as I see them, regard the German system and the Germans with a profound, honest, deep-seated hatred as the enemies of civilization, freedom, and national independence; they regard with absolute loathing the wanton cruelties which have disfigured every German campaign. I do not think they have any affectation in their feelings; I do not think they underrate or despise their opponents; I think they quite realize German efficiency. There may be cases, of course, of persons who have been ardent pacifists or Socialists, who now, for official reasons best known to themselves, think it desirable to "affect" contempt for the Germans; but to me it seems that there is no affectation about the feeling of the American people. However, Mr. President, it is not a question of phrases, felicitous as the President's always are. He points out that, whatever we do, we should not adopt measures which are characteristically German, and I agree with him.

The fundamental principle which lies at the bottom of the whole German system, without which it would totter and fall in ruin, is the "right divine of kings to govern wrong," as the old verse has it. The "right divine" of the Hohenzollerns, the autocracy, is the center of their power and the principle on which everything else rests; and I think, Mr. President, that I am entirely at one with the President of the United States, that we do not desire to put ourselves on that level, and particularly we should not wish to set up here, as some people seem to desire, a second-rate autocracy, an imitation of something which could not exist here, and never can exist here, unless we fall the victims of German ambition, and which has fundamentally more resemblance to the autocracy of the Bolsheviki in Russia, which has succeeded the feeble autocracy of the Romanoffs. We must not have that sort of thing.

I do not tremble or shrink about granting powers which are necessary to win the war; I am ready to give them, and to give them in the fullest measure; but I do object in the strongest way to giving powers which have no direct relation to the war, but which have a very large relation to politics and to civil life in peace times.

It is proposed, Mr. President, by this amendment to exempt from the operations of this act the Federal Reserve Board. Of course, the Federal Reserve Board is acting in harmony with the administration, and of course it will continue so to do. Every member of that board is the President's appointee; but when you take that board, which has done admirable work, and the entire system which it controls and put them under this bill, to be shifted and changed in any way that may catch the fancy not of the President but of somebody associated with him; when you give him the power, not to remove the members of the Federal Reserve Board because he has that power in any event, but, as the Senator from Colorado pointed out, the power to change the presidents of the Federal reserve banks and drive from the boards of the Federal reserve banks or the member banks any director whom he does not like; when you put that power in the hands nominally of the President, but really in the Treasury Department, you run the risk of wrecking the whole of this great system of banks, one of the few engines which we possess that has worked admirably from the beginning of the war and with which we have had no fault to find. That was the feeling we had when we passed the finance corporation bill; the feeling of the Finance Committee was extremely strong to protect in every way the Federal Reserve System; and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is doing me the honor of listening to me, insisted on still further protection for the banking system, and I believe he was right.

It is not a question of what the President may do to that board; it is a question of what some subordinate to whom the power is intrusted may do to it; and it seems to me to be running a most needless peril to put the great Federal Reserve System, the Federal reserve banks, and the national banks in a position where they may be interfered with—not wrecked, but seriously interfered with—by some Treasury official who does not happen to like the way they operate or who wishes to punish some personal enemy. I see no possible reason for keeping the banks within the range of this bill; they are a most important engine of carrying on the war; they are working very well; and they also have an intimate relation to the entire business of the country, both in peace and in war. It seems to me madness to put them in a position where they may be interfered with and seriously damaged, for any damage to the system and to the banks at this time would bring on a panic, which I for one dislike to contemplate.

Now, there is the Interstate Commerce Commission. The question concerning that commission has been very fully argued. I hold a similar view about that, although not quite so strongly.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has been largely shorn of its powers by the railroad bill. The railroads now are practically in the hands of the Government. Leaving the commission out of this bill would not affect the operation of the railroads during the war at all; but the Intersate Commerce Commission affords an opportunity for publicity, as was pointed out by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], which I think to be extremely wholesome; also it has in charge the valuation of the railroads. That work has proceeded for some three years; it is a matter on which a great deal of money has been spent, and which, I believe, has been very well done. That work has nothing conceivable to do with the war; it is a work being done under the direction of Congress, by a board established by Congress, to carry out the peculiar powers of Congress under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. I think that to take away the valuation of the railroads, half done or a third done, and hand it over to some of the Treasury officials who have never given any particular attention to it, because now they happen to be running the railroads, would be very unfortunate.

There are two other organizations which I think ought to be exempted, which I have not heard suggested here, although I understand the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has an amendment about one of them. They are purely congressional organizations. One is the Government Printing Office. The Government Printing Office is one of the establishments of Congress; and the joint committee of the two Houses——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LODGE. I move to strike out the word "authority," in the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "powers," as a perfecting amendment, and I will speak upon that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the proviso offered by Mr. SMITH of Georgia it is proposed to strike out the word "authority" and insert the word "powers."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was speaking of the Government Printing Office. Our joint committee makes all the contracts, and we run it all. I think it is well run. Of course the Public Printer is appointed by the President, which is entirely proper and right. He always has been. But the Government Printing Office has been, and ought to remain, under the control of the Congress of the United States. I think it is better for the Government and better for the country that the printing of the Government should be in the hands of the Government Printing Office under the control of Congress than be committed, for instance, to Mr. Creel, we will say. I say the same thing about the Library of Congress, which bears the name of Congress. I think the Library of Congress ought to be exempted from the operation of this bill, if this bill covers it, as I have no doubt it does.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator think that under this bill, if it should pass as it is introduced, the President could control the Printing Office and regulate the printing of the proceedings of Congress and all that?

Mr. LODGE. I have not the slightest doubt of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course, the Senator does not think he would undertake anything of that kind, does he?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no, Mr. President. I am going to speak on that point in a moment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But I want to say to the Senator that if he is not going to exercise that power, there is no reason why it should be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I quite agree with the Senator. I do not believe in the system—I think it is an entirely false system—ever to give in a bill a power that the Congress does not intend to have used and is not ready to see used. I think to put in powers loosely, generally, on the theory that they will not be used, is an entirely wrong theory of legislation.

Mr. President, those are four of the instruments of government which I think it would be well to exempt. But when these suggestions are made, as they have been made by Senators, we are always met with the cry, "Can you not trust the President?"

Mr. President, that is the most empty inquiry and meaningless argument ever made. It is not a question of trusting or distrusting; it is a question of legislating properly. Have we fallen so low as the question of distrusting somebody in framing legislation? Why, the entire Constitution of the United States is based on distrust of human nature when intrusted with power. There are limitations placed on everybody—President, courts, Senate, House. The terms of office of the executive and legislative officers of the Government are limited—even that. The whole theory of a democratic government is that the people intrusted with power should be carefully limited, because the theory of our ancestors—and it is a good theory to-day—was that human nature is too weak to be intrusted with unlimited power, and that when it is intrusted with unlimited power the rights of the people are in danger.

George Washington presided over the convention which framed the Constitution; and everybody knew, as he knew, that if there was a President he would be that President. Did he ever suggest to anybody that the clauses they put in there limiting the President's powers, limiting him in his right to make a treaty, for instance, or appoint an officer, by putting in the confirmation of the Senate should not be put in because to do so manifested a distrust of him? Why, of course not. Washington was a very great man. Such an idea would never have occurred to his mind.

It is not a question of trusting or distrusting. It is not a question of whether the President would do something absurd or whether he would not do something absurd. It is a question of granting powers which ought not to be granted or that it is not necessary to grant. Also, Mr. President, on that question of trusting, it simply proceeds upon what I think is the reasonable doctrine that there is no one mind in this country who is infallible. A man does not acquire infallibility by coming into the Presidency any more than he acquires infallibility by coming into the Senate or the House. Congress may be a help and ought to be a help to the Executive always, and particularly in time of war, and there is nothing but readiness to help in every way upon the part of Congress, but on the other hand it is slavish, it is beyond words slavish, to my mind; it is the attitude of courtiers to contend that the Congress of the United States, elected by the people, holding office by the same title as the President himself, is not entitled respectfully to offer him its advice on a bill which some subordinate in a department has drawn. There is no disrespect to anyone involved and none intended, and it never would have been thought of if it had not been suggested by those who are interested in passing the bill.

Mr. President, I think these things are important, but I think an importance has been attached to this bill and to the amendments which perhaps goes beyond the real scope of the measure. It seems to have been treated as if the one thing were for the President to win in the Senate a personal victory; to show that a committee which suggested bills could not pass its bills, but that he could pass one under another name and in vague general terms doing just the same thing.

Mr. President, if that is a comfort to the President of the United States I for one do not grudge it to him. I am very glad that he should have it, if he finds any sort of satisfaction or pleasure in it. Let me say, however, Mr. President, with all solemnity, that the victories won here or in the House on amendments or in passing bills will be forgotten before another week closes. The only place to win the victories that will endure is across the seas, where the American armies are.

Let us stop winning victories over each other and over ourselves and devote all our heart and soul and strength to winning victories across the water. My one desire is that those victories should be won. I feel about this as Lincoln did when they came to him in the summer of 1864 and said: "You had better take care; they are talking about Grant. They will nominate him for the Presidency." Lincoln turned on them and said: "If he will take Richmond he may have the Presidency."

The President, if he will only win this war and gather about him men who can win the war, and men who, when they go abroad, command the respect of our allies, may have the Presidency, and everything else he wants for himself, so far as I am concerned.

I would be very glad to add at the end of my remarks, if I may, what Story says about the Executive power under the Constitution, and I would also like to have printed what Mr. Creel remarked about the work of the first session of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SEC. 1512. On the other hand, considering the delicacy and extent of the power it is too much to expect that a free people would confide to a single magistrate, however respectable, the sole authority to act conclusively, as well as exclusively, upon the subject of treaties. In England the power to make treaties is exclusively vested in the Crown. But, however proper it may be in a monarchy, there is no American statesman but must feel that such a prerogative in an American President would be inexpedient and dangerous. It would be inconsistent with that wholesome jealousy which all republics ought to cherish, of all depositaries of power; and which, experience teaches us, is the best security against the abuse of it. The check which acts upon the mind, from the consideration that which is done is but preliminary and requires the assent of other independent minds to give it a legal conclusiveness, is a restraint which awakens caution and compels deliberation. [From War Information Series No. 10, Oct., 1917, "First Session of the War Congress," by Charles Mertz, in the "Foreword."]

The Sixty-fifth Congress, now adjourning, deserves the gratitude and appreciation of a people whose will and purpose I believe it has faithfully expressed. One can not examine the record of its action without being impressed by its completeness, its courage, and its full comprehension of a great task. The needs of the Army and the Navy have been met in a way that assures the effectiveness of American arms, and the war-making branch of the Government has been abundantly equipped with the powers that were necessary to make the action of the Nation effective.

I believe that it has also in equal degree, and as far as possible in the face of war, safeguarded the rights of the people and kept in mind the considerations of social justice so often obscured in the hasty readjustment of such a crisis.

It seems to me that the work of this remarkable session has not only been done thoroughly but that it has also been done with the utmost dispatch possible in the circumstances or consistent with a full consideration of the exceedingly critical matters dealt with. Best of all, it has left no doubt as to the spirit and determination of the country, but has affirmed them as loyally and as emphatically as our fine soldiers will affirm them on the firing line.

* * * * * * *

GEORGE CREEL.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I wish to fortify a feature of the observations of the Senator from Massachusetts. Some of his conclusions I contest.

Mr. President, I want to make a reference for a moment or two to a matter which seems apart from this bill, but which as I see it is very necessary to be considered at this time to prevent the American public from any longer indulging in false premises from which the citizens are reaching an unjust conclusion.

The Senator from Massachusetts appropriately adverts to the slander of Congress, charging us here with delay in the procedure of legislation, but, Mr. President, as great as is the effect of the wrong because of that false accusation it is small indeed compared to the effect on the public mind that is being created by the charge of delay on the part of the United States in sending soldiers to Europe.

Mr. President, it is time that we speak frankly to the American public, and so far as I can see it the time has come to end the assumption that disclosure of truth will do injury.

Mr. President, if the conditions of this war are such as now indicate that it would have been proper to have sent soldiers very early to Europe, I want my fellow Americans to understand it is no fault of this country that the soldiers were not sent. The country must now know from some one, and I am bold enough for myself—in connection with the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts—to allude to it, to assert it, and I take the responsibility for what I am now going to say.

When war was declared requests came to this Government from representatives of the allies here located in Washington that we do not send troops. The request was that we send supplies. We were besought to withhold certain troops. On the part of one of the allies was the humane consideration that the men were not prepared and should not be sent abroad to meet a new warfare, the method of which the world had never known—far less the United States experienced—until something had been done which could train them at home and equip them upon our own local field for the adventure to which they must advance.

Then, Mr. President, from another of the representatives of the allies here in Washington was the very free statement that not for one year should the United States send any troops, and the demand, if we can use that word in dealing with subjects of politeness and diplomacy, that we should not send our troops previous to that year on the theory, first, that the allies were able with the forces at hand to command all the situation then before them and for a year——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Then at the end of that it was assumed we would be in a position, because our men would be then trained and in such a state of preparation as would justify them in being sent to Europe.

I yield at this moment to the Senator from North Dakota. I have but a few moments, as the Senator knows.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to ask the Senator if at the time those suggestions were made Russia did not have in the field at least from three to four million men?

Mr. LEWIS. There is a great deal, Mr. President, to be advanced in support of the position of the Senator and in support of it, that it might have been in the minds of those representatives that from Russia could be obtained sufficient for the time, but, sirs, our country must know that the reason the delay was had was because of these assurances from men who represented the allies, whatever might have been the matter upon which they based their confidence.

Therefore, Mr. President, our countrymen must not be stricken with alarm and our people must not be influenced that some great wrong has transpired on the part of officers, of Congress, or the administration because soldiers have not been hastily sent to Europe and are not now upon the field.

The cry that comes to us to-day from papers quoted from certain official representatives of foreign governments assuming to criticize because we have not hurried must be replied to from this rostrum, if from no other place, that if there has been delay, causing inconvenience or any other result, it was not that initiated by America, but at the specific instance of those called the allies. It may be that at the outset it was stimulated out of a humane consideration that it would require a year for preparation, or, as the Senator from North Dakota intimates, because of their confidence that Russia would furnish sufficient within that year.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am interested and somewhat surprised at the statement the Senator is making. My memory is fairly good, and I remember that when the representatives of the French Government were here Gen. Joffre stood beside the Vice President and called upon us to send troops, saying that they could be trained in France better than they could in this country.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, calling to his mind exactly what the matter was.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken about the statement of Gen. Joffre.

Mr. GALLINGER. Gen. Joffre advised that when he was here. It is a matter of record.

Mr. LEWIS. Permit me to assure the Senator I shall give him exactly what happened, and I hope to assure the Senator I am not speaking ex cathedra, I am speaking from information from other sources wholly reliable. Mr. President, I invite the able Senator from New Hampshire and see if he will not agree with me on this. The request made was first to send officers only, on the theory of the effect on the morale and encouragement of their presence. Senators will recall that their presence there seems to have received that reception which they deserved. Then afterwards came a request later following on that we send some soldiers of the Regular Army. After an expiration of time it was discovered that something else should be done, and now the remark of the eminent Senator from Massachusetts becomes appropriate, because it was at this point referred to that the request came to this country to send the soldiers. Then we sent the regular soldiers to the extent we could. But in the meantime the failure to anticipate that they would be needed at once, and the taking up of their preparation for a whole year here at our own home was at the instance of the representatives of the allies. That is what I wish to impress upon the country as replying to my eminent friend.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I only want to state in this connection what Gen. Joffre said to me personally, and I recall it very well. He said, "Send us all the men you can. I know you have not a large Army. Send us 10,000 men if you can not send any more, but send us all you possibly can. If they are new troops we will train them there, but send the men, because it will have an immense moral effect." I remember the conversation extremely well.

Mr. LEWIS. It may be that Gen. Joffre had some personal conversation with the senior Senator from Massachusetts, but I am able to say, sir, that the viewpoint officially was that which I have expressed, and I take it that what Gen. Joffre said to the Senator from Massachusetts practically was what was the real situation—10,000 men, a small bit, for moral effect. And now to charge from any part of the world that the United States had failed because it assumed to keep men here and train them and equip them before they were sent abroad and intimate that that delay suggests some offense on the part of our country for negligence and incompetence is an unfair accusation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield again to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I was making no charge of negligence or incompetence, but it was not to send only 10,000, it was to send all you can, just as they offered us transportation last winter to carry men over there. It was refused.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. First, I reply to the Senator from Massachusetts. As to the particular time to which the Senator alludes I do not know; of course I could not contest the fact of the conversation that the Senator claims he had with Joffre, but we do know what the representatives presented, and I insist, sir, that at the particular time they demanded that we should send those we could spare; it referred to those who were then prepared and in a condition to go.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. LEWIS. A small detachment for "moral effect." The other observation to which I allude—that they were prepared—I wish to correct. It was then the third call came. It was for the National Guard, following the call for a part of the Regular Army, that then came the changed position, and for the first time it was asserted that soldiers could be sent abroad and could be trained in Europe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield to the Senator, knowing that he will not take more time than he ought.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator's time is nearly exhausted, and perhaps I had better not ask the question, as it may lead to some discussion.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in the moment or two remaining I want to address myself doubly to the second amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I have a right to do that while on my feet.

It is that this bill, if it will be passed hastily, will enable the President of the United States to take such steps as will bring about a compliance with these new demands. I invite the consideration of the Senate now, and my judgment is that we have now reached the point in this war when the navies of the contesting forces must be brought into operation. I am not assuming to tell these forces how to conduct their war, but it is apparent if we can not end the German drive by July 1 and reverse it, as I have said in other places we must do, if we can get the men that we now know are ready to go to the transports from the land, then, sir, it is apparent that the Navy must be brought into operation and this conflict brought to the sea, where the unvanquished and invisible American Navy can effect, in conjunction with those of the allies, that good service and success which our country knows is due us and will be coming surely to us.

But, sir, before we can do it three things must really transpire: First, this measure giving the President an immediate operation to put into effect such instrumentalities as can hastily bring the result. Lastly, I allude to the observations of the Senator from Massachusetts about "trust the President." I advise the Senator from Massachusetts that he is in error when he says that expression was only born here to carry through this measure. It was born by the eminent Republican leaders of the Senate, of which the eminent Senator was wisely and justly one, in the Spanish-American War, when the cry went forth from this body, "Trust McKinley," "Trust the President"; and in all the political campaigns of that day that was the cry. He was trusted. In this case it is only asked that we trust our President to exercise such a discretion as a faithful Commander in Chief under the solemnity of his oath and the privileges of the Constitution would exercise; nothing more.

There is no request to trust him to do things that are questionable, to trust him to do things that are illegal, to trust him to do things that are not warranted by the Constitution, but to trust that the only things he will do will be those warranted by the conditions, called for by the circumstances, and justified by the necessity. It is for that reason, sir, that we should pass the measure to accomplish this object. I shall not occupy the floor longer for that purpose. I merely refute the false impression now prevailing as to the action of our country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill, and I shall vote for it either with the proposed amendments or without the proposed amendments. I think it but fair, however, to say that I do not attach the importance to this bill that has been indicated by the long period of time it has been before the Senate and the long and earnest speeches that have been made both for and against its provisions. All of the important powers that are granted in this bill are either powers that are already inherent in the Chief Magistrate or powers that have been granted specially by the Constitution or powers which we, during this last Congress, have especially delegated to the President. When we examine the full scope and extent of those powers we will find that there are few left to be covered by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. President, I think the effect of the bill, so far as its influence on any war measure is concerned, will be very remote, to say the least. In all of the arguments that have been made I have failed utterly to catch any great controlling reason for the passage of the bill itself. On the other hand, I fail to realize any great and impending danger if all the powers contained in the bill should be granted to the President. I must assume that the President of the United States will exercise the authority contained in the provisions of the bill to the extent only that such authority is necessary for the conduct of the war and that he will not interfere with those things which have not the least possible relation to the war. The powers are not so far-reaching as many of those which we have already granted by legislation during the past year.

If, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President of the United States thinks that there are any powers which we have not already granted to him which are constitutional, and which are really necessary for the conduct of the war, I am willing to grant those additional powers. The President is in a far better position than am I to determine whether or not conflicting bureaus or duplicating offices are a hindrance rather than an assistance to him in his efforts in the prosecution of the war. I am willing to defer to his judgment along that line; but, Mr. President, I shall exercise my judgment as to voting for some of these amendments.

I can not conceive of any possibility of the President interfering with the Interstate Commerce Commission. I can not see how he can possibly say that interference with that commission can by any possibility assist in the prosecution of the war. I can not see how he can dispense with the services of this most important commission in the great problems of transportation, which will press upon the administration for solution during the period he will exercise the authority which we have conferred upon him to operate all the railways of the country; but as there are many Senators and others who feel that there is some danger in granting the power in the broad terms of the bill, to ease their fears I am perfectly willing to vote with them to amend the bill excepting the Interstate Commerce Commission from the operation of this proposed legislation.

What I now say in reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission can be said with equal or greater force with reference to our banking institution as it now exists.

There has been another suggestion made, and that is in reference to our Government Printing Office. I am perfectly willing to vote to exclude that from the operation of the proposed law; not that I am fearful that the President will interfere with it, for I can not conceive of a case that would justify him in any interference with the Government Printing Office, which is purely and simply a creature of Congress for the purpose of carrying out the functions of the legislative department of the Government, any more than he would be justified in interfering with a joint committee of Congress or a committee of either one of the two Houses. So, Mr. President, I should be willing to vote also for an amendment excluding that establishment, and possibly for other amendments which might be offered.

I repeat, I can not regard this bill as of the same degree of importance as do many Senators in this body. I am not fearful of the authority that will be exercised under it; but as the President seems to think that he needs the additional authority, as he seems to believe that he can better carry this war to a successful issue if the bill be passed, I am willing to grant the power to him, so that, at least, I shall not be criticized and shall not allow Congress to be criticized by reason of my vote in not supporting the President in everything that he or Congress can possibly deem necessary for the successful prosecution of the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). The pending question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood the amendment to the amendment had been withdrawn by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the amendment to the amendment has not been withdrawn.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to speak to the amendment.

The bill as drawn authorizes any President during the war, or for 12 months after the war closes, to transfer all the duties and authority of the Federal Reserve Board to any other board or to any officer in the Government. All the duties of the Federal Reserve Board could be transferred to an auditor in either of the departments, simply to illustrate the effect of the bill. Our banking and currency system leans on the Federal Reserve Board to a great extent. I wish to refresh the memory of Senators by calling attention to the duties of the Federal Reserve Board.

We have 12 reserve banks, each situated in a reserve district. We have required all of the national banks to subscribe to the stock of the respective Federal reserve banks, and we transfer the reserves of those member banks to the Federal reserve banks. We permit other banks and trust companies to come into the reserve system by taking stock in the reserve banks and being subject to the same rules in their relations to them which national banks bear. The Federal reserve banks not only discount the paper of the member banks but they may also issue Federal reserve notes, like the national-bank notes or other paper currency which is used by the public, not speaking technically, but in language that is generally understood, as money, as currency, for the transaction of business. So these 12 Federal reserve banks are organized to enlarge the currency as business needs it, and are expected to contract it as it is no longer needed. They not only furnish enlarged credits to their member banks which they in turn furnish to the public, but they enlarge the currency to meet the needs of situations as they develop. Their importance to our banking and currency conditions must be apparent.

The Federal Reserve Board controls these 12 banks. The banking and currency act expressly declares that they shall exercise general supervision over the 12 Federal reserve banks; that is to say, that the Federal Reserve Board shall exercise general control over them.

Going further, the act provides that the Federal Reserve Board may remove all the directors and officers of any of the Federal reserve banks. They can take charge of the business of any one of the reserve banks. Under the statute they can put any one of them in liquidation without going into the courthouse; they can conduct the business or wind up the business of a reserve bank. By rates of interest they can control the issue of Federal reserve notes. Going further, they can by a vote of five out of seven compel any one reserve bank to rediscount the notes of any other reserve bank. The Federal Reserve Board have entire supervision and control of the 12 reserve banks. They therefore control the enlargement of currency; they control the contraction of currency; they control the enlargement of credits; they control the contraction of credits.

We realized the importance of this board when we passed the statute; we realized that it stood in a class all by itself; and we fixed certain requirements which must be met in men who are nominated by the President for positions on that board. We said that no man could be nominated who was an officer of any bank or who held stock in any bank. We said that two of the board must be men skilled in finance and banking; we said that the President must not take more than one from any reserve district; that in selecting them he should do so with regard to the representations of the different commercial, industrial, and geographical conditions. We went further and said that any one of the men so serving could not hold an office or have a business connection with any bank affiliated with the Federal Reserve System for two years after he ceased to be a member of the Federal Reserve Board. We also provided that the President for cause could remove either of them.

Why did we throw these safeguards around the men who were to carry this great trust? We gave them office for 10 years each; we put them in a class to themselves and required conduct different from that of other officers. Why? Because we placed a responsibility on them under the law that we thought could only be met fully by such requirements. We even went further: Recognizing our responsibility as a Senate, we provided that if the President made an appointment in recess, that appointment could only last for 30 days after Congress met. We were unwilling to leave an appointee of the President in office more than 30 days after the Senate met unless the Senate approved the appointment.

Then we realized our part of the responsibility, and we were willing to bear it. Now, it is proposed to permit any President—President Wilson, if he remains President, or, if the war lasts that long, the President who comes after him, or, if a casualty should come to him before the end of his term, his successor—to transfer these extraordinary powers, involving the banking and commercial life of this country, to anybody he sees fit, without limitation or without qualification. Under this bill the vast and important powers of the Federal Reserve Board may be transferred to an auditor in the Treasury Department.

I should like to know what Senator wishes these powers transferred to any other officer of the Government, and to what officer? I do not believe the Senator from North Carolina wishes them transferred from the place where they are now reposed. If he does not, why does he insist upon keeping the power in the bill? I can not conceive of President Wilson making the transfer, but I do not know who may have charge of the White House before this war is over, and I feel that I would be abandoning my duty as a Senator if I agreed that anyone under any circumstances should have such a power. It is a dangerous power; it is an unwise power; it is an unnecessary power. The Senator from North Carolina ought to accept the amendment. He knows he does not wish any such power exercised.

Talk about delaying this bill! If this amendment and one exempting the Interstate Commerce Commission had been agreed to shortly after the bill had been introduced, it would have passed two months ago. The sponsors for the bill must not have thought it was very important to secure the other powers. Otherwise they would have stopped opposition by agreeing to except from its provisions the Federal Reserve Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate, and I will not do so. I simply urge upon Senators that this amendment ought to be adopted; that it is not right to place in doubt the Federal Reserve Board, with its vast responsibilities to the commerce, to the industries, and to the banking of the country.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should not have said anything but for the fact that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] referred to me. I desire to say that this bill does not give any power to the President directly to do some of the things which it has been charged could be done under it. There is nothing said about the Federal Reserve Board or about the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Senator says that, if he were President, he would not transfer any of the functions of the Federal Reserve Board to any other organization; neither would any other Senator upon this floor, and neither would the President of the United States; and I am here to tell you Senators that the President has no idea of interfering in any way whatever with the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have not the time to yield to the Senator. However, I will do so, if he desires.

Mr. REED. If that is the case, if the Senator is perfectly certain of what he says, why does he not accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am going, if the Senator will take his seat, to explain that question.

Mr. REED. I will take it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not mean any disrespect to the Senator, but I have only 20 minutes and I wish to conclude what I have to say.

Mr. President, the President of the United States, even if he has the power under this bill to interfere with the Federal Reserve Board, could not exercise that power under his oath of office unless he did so in the interest of the national security and defense; he could not exercise it unless, in his opinion, it was necessary for the successful prosecution of the war; he could not exercise it unless it were for the support and maintenance of the Army and the Navy. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said, if it were necessary in order to save this country, he would be willing for the President to exercise such power, and so would everybody else; but, I repeat, the President will not exercise it, and I tell you he is not going to exercise it, unless it is absolutely necessary; and he can not exercise it, under his oath of office, with the limitations provided in the bill unless he is a dishonest man.

There is a limitation provided in the bill that such powers shall be exercised only in the interest of the national defense; there is another provision limiting its exercise to those things which are necessary in the successful prosecution of the war and for the support and maintenance of the Army and the Navy; and then there is a general sweeping clause, which reads:

Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

It seems to me that Senators have assumed a "holier than thou" attitude. The Senator from Georgia would not exercise the power which it has been charged would be exercised; I would not exercise it; and why do Senators think the President would exercise it? That is the reason, I will say to my esteemed friend from Missouri [Mr. REED], why I will not accept this amendment, because it is an express statement that we are afraid to trust the power to the President; it is an express intimation that we fear he will do that which no one of the 96 Senators who constitute this body would do. The argument seems to be, "We fear the President might do it, and therefore we will adopt such an amendment." That is the reason why I will not accept any such amendment, for I believe in my heart it would humiliate the President. I do not charge, however, that that is the intention of the author of the amendment. Put yourselves in the President's place. If you were in his place would you stand here and argue for the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not necessarily; but if I were in his place, I would ask Congress to remove such a provision from this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator were President, knowing him as I do, I think he would come to Congress and ask for this general power. If the general power is right, vote for the bill without limitations; if it is wrong, vote, like men, against it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I would perfect it, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. OVERMAN. I say there is too much of a "holier than thou" attitude on the part of Senators; there have been many things said that ought not to have been said upon this floor—some cheap talk and criticism that I am glad to see has been eliminated from the RECORD by Senators who uttered it. Some indirect, unjust intimations have been made that the President ought not to be trusted. You may criticize the President as much as you please, but it will do no more harm than a grapeshot against a great battleship.

Last night I attended one of the greatest meetings that I have ever seen in Washington, except Billy Sunday's meetings—and it was in the Billy Sunday Tabernacle. Incidentally some speaker referred to this bill and the power given to the President and expressed the hope that it would pass. I never saw such an ovation in my life as I saw then in that great tabernacle. So, whatever you say about the President of the United States, or however you may play politics and try to throw dust in the eyes of the people of this country, in their hearts they trust him, although some Senators may not trust him.

My distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]—and I love him; we have served together in the Senate; I served here when he was Secretary of State and also when he was Attorney General; and I admire his great ability—and I had a little colloquy a day or two ago from which I read the following from the RECORD:

Mr. President, I had difficulty in reaching a conclusion about this measure; but at last a thought came to my mind which clarified my duty, which made it perfectly easy for me to answer the question: "Shall I vote yea or nay upon this measure?" and I ask each Senator to put this question to himself: Should you vote for this bill unless you would be willing to vote specifically for anything that is possible under the bill? For instance, if you believe that under the provisions of this bill the powers of the Federal Reserve Board could be transferred to a minor official of the United States Government, or the Federal reserve banks could be merged in any insignificant national bank of the country, and that bill stood alone, would you vote for that bill? If you would not, you should not vote for a bill that includes that power. If a bill was proposed to transfer the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission to an inferior officer of the Government, would you vote for that bill if it stood alone? If you would not, you should not vote for this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KNOX. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I take it, from what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said, that he would not vote for such a bill as he has described.

Mr. KNOX. I certainly would not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania assume to himself more honesty, more statesmanship, and a higher sense of duty than are possessed by the great Executive head of this Government?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I am glad to answer that question. I challenge the Senator from North Carolina to recall from his memory or to search to-morrow morning the record of what I have said this afternoon, or to go over anything that I have said heretofore on the floor of the Senate since the declaration of war from which he can draw any conclusion that I have assumed anything upon my own part. I am stating, sir, what I started out to state; I am giving the reasons why I am going to vote against this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the question I want to put to the Senator. He says he would not vote for such a bill as that which he has described, nor would any other Senator vote for such a bill. Then the Senator is bound, under the same reasoning, to say that under this bill the President of the United States, acting for the people of this country, with statesmanship and ability and honesty, would not transfer the authority in the manner which the Senator has suggested. Is not that a just conclusion from what the Senator says?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I am arguing that we ought not to vote for a bill that gives the President such authority unless we would vote specifically for a measure that gave him that authority, and nothing else.

Mr. OVERMAN. And I intend to vote for this measure on the assumption that the President would exercise the powers conferred with the same honesty and the same ability as would the Senator from Pennsylvania, and therefore would not attempt to interfere with the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. President, the Senator ought to have gone one step further. With all due respect to him, when he asked himself the question whether he should vote for this bill, he ought also, if he desired to be impartial, to have asked the other question, Would the President of the United States do that which I would not do, having been elevated to this high office by the people of the United States—transfer the power, which it is alleged he can transfer under the provisions of this bill, when, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says, he would not vote, and no other Senator would vote, such transfer? Would the President—not only President Wilson, but any President—transfer that power when his power under this bill is limited to those objects which have in mind the national defense, when his power is limited to acting in matters relating to the conduct of the war? Is not the President not to be accredited with the same patriotism, the same ability, the same honesty of purpose as I?

Mr. President, I repeat that if this general power is right, let us give it to the President without any amendment; but if it is wrong, let us vote against it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, first of all I want to apologize to the very distinguished Senator who has charge of this bill for having even ventured to interrupt the flow of his sublime eloquence by a question. It was a perfectly proper rebuke which he administered when he told me, with that politeness which always characterizes him, to sit down. The truth is, I have not been able to keep up with the rapid march of events, or quite to appreciate the altitudes to which the distinguished Senator has climbed since he came to be in charge of this legislation. But speaking from the depths of my humility, and in my own time, and having thus sufficiently, I trust, apologized, I am going to venture one or two suggestions.

The Senator always makes an argument that is unanswerable, because he proceeds first by filing a general denial of any intent or purpose on the part of the President or on the part of any other officer ever to exercise the powers conferred in the bill, and having given us that assurance of absolute and perfect safety he proceeds to clinch the argument by saying that, of course, if it is necessary in order to whip the Germans, then the thing may be done, and that we are justified in doing anything, even to the destruction of our form of government, in order to whip the Germans.

Now, either this bill confers powers or it does not confer powers, and either those powers are necessary or they are unnecessary. That the bill confers the powers no one will debate. The question as to whether the powers are necessary or unnecessary ought to be answered according to the logic of the situation; and we can not answer in that logical manner by merely growing red in the face and speaking with a tremulous voice or in a loud tone. The moment any Senator stands upon this floor defending these powers and at the same time asserting that these powers will never be utilized, he asserts that they are not necessary. When a man has asserted that a power is not necessary and that it will never be utilized, he has asserted that the power should never be granted.

Of course, that does not appeal to the Senator in charge of the bill. But the Senator has another answer. He states that the President can not exercise this authority unless he does it in matters relating to the conduct of the present war, and that whatever is necessary to the conduct of the present war must, of course, be granted. He speaks several times in his remarks about the language that "the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war." I call the Senator's attention to the fact that he opposed that amendment in the committee, that he voted against that amendment in the committee, that he did everything he could to keep that amendment out of the bill in the committee. He wanted the powers to be granted without even that limitation.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator ought to be fair and state why. I do not think I did, but if the Senator says I did, I did. I said that the words "during the present war" were in the first paragraph of the bill as it came to the committee.

Mr. REED. I am not speaking of that. I am speaking of the words of limitation that the Senator appealed to, and that were offered as an amendment by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] and were barely adopted. The Senator from Delaware voted for his own amendment, and I think one other Senator, and that is the way this clause comes to be in the bill. That, however, is not very material. I desire especially to reply to certain observations made by the Senator, not only in the last few moments but a score of times during the progress of the debate, that those who opposed this bill are playing politics, and he has used the term "playing cheap politics," and he has used the term that they are professing to be "holier than thou art." Now, when the Senator gets his throat full of adjectives and his head full of blood he sometimes says things that out of the goodness of his heart and the generosity of his spirit he does not really mean; but he did use those terms, and he has used them repeatedly.

The Senator will not dispute the fact that a few weeks ago he was one of those Senators who said they were opposed to granting more power. The Senator will not dispute the fact that he himself was the author of the resolution which struck out of the pending bill the words "and empowered," in the ninth line on the first page, and inserted the word "authorized." The Senator at that time was not in favor of granting more power, and said he would not grant any more power, but that he would grant authority; and for about two days we debated the question whether there was any difference between authority and power.

Now, that is all right. The Senator had a right to change his mind. Wise men do change their minds, and no man is to be at all lampooned because he changes his mind; but when he changes his mind he ought not to charge everybody with playing politics who did not have quite so acrobatic a character of intellect. He ought to concede that those who remain steadfast to the views they entertained are entitled to the same kindly judgment that he would have expected for himself had he on that particular point continued to maintain his intellectual stability.

Mr. President, I believe that I have the right to appeal to even the author of this bill, to its sponsor, and to the Senate in behalf of the particular amendment now before us. I was a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, to which was referred the bill that created the Federal Reserve Banking System. It came to us in a somewhat crude form and there were some members of the committee who insisted upon having hearings, studying the bill, letting the voice of the country be heard, and amending, where necessary, the bill. I was one of the members who made that insistence. I remember at that time how the press of the country abused every man who so stood for investigation, and how in the Senate they were unpopular, and how in their own States they were criticized and abused, and how, finally, a Democratic caucus was called to force these recalcitrant Democrats to yield their point of view. I also remember that the Democratic caucus was finally adjourned because there were some pretty plain statements made in it. I remember how we continued day after day to consider the bill and to amend it until over 500 amendments had been made, and when at last it was adopted, having been amended 514 times over the protest of a number of very distinguished gentlemen in the Senate and out of it, it was pronounced the greatest piece of constructive legislation of this century.

Mr. President, I have no more hesitancy in standing here to-day for a thing that I believe is right than I had then, and I shall no more be intimidated by loud-mouthed bayings, either in the Senate or out of the Senate, about "playing politics" than I was intimidated then. Whenever the time comes that I can not stand at my place in this Chamber and voice my honest sentiments I shall give place to some one whose views may be more popular or whose opinions may be more easily changed to conform to the tides of opinion that may be running at that particular moment.

This is what I have to say to the Senate in regard to this particular amendment: When the banking bill reached the Senate the power to control the currency of our country, to control the credits of this great land, was practically concentrated in the banks. It was believed that a few great banks could control the volume of our currency by dominating this system. I was one of the eight members of that committee who insisted, in season and out of season, by day and by night, that the power of control should be vested in the Federal Reserve Board, and not in the banks; that the Federal Reserve Board should be made supreme, because if the power to control our credits had to be put somewhere, I wanted it put in a board that would be nominated by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, so that the people, through this board thus appointed, would control the financial destiny of their own country. Those amendments went into the bill over great opposition, and are found in the law to-day.

Mr. President, it was stated at that time that this board was to be created so that it would be independent of any President; independent of any particular man at any particular time. The board was to be composed of men who were to be appointed at different periods of time. It was carefully arranged so that there should always be upon the board old members, unless they were removed for cause, who would hold over from one presidential term to another. That was deemed wise and prudent, and it was wise and prudent. It was also provided that these men must be confirmed by the Senate of the United States, and if any one of them was ousted his successor in like manner must be confirmed by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the appointments must be sent in within 30 days after the Senate met.

Mr. REED. Yes; and an additional clause was put in, as the Senator from Georgia states, requiring that these names should be sent to the Senate within 30 days after the Senate should meet, a clause that you do not find with reference to any other board or tribunal that has been created by the Congress.

Now, Mr. President, what is the proposition if this amendment be defeated? It means that you propose to confer upon the President—not Woodrow Wilson, but whoever may be President during the course of this war, which may last for months and which may last for years—the right to do what? To confer all of the powers possessed by the Federal Reserve Board as a whole upon any one member of the board; aye, more, to confer all of the powers possessed by the entire board upon any officer of the Government. They can be conferred the day after this bill is passed upon an officer who has never been confirmed by the Senate, whose name has never been sent to us. Moreover, if the bill be passed to-day, the board can be filled up to-morrow by men who have never been confirmed by the Senate by the simple process of transferring into the positions held by members of the Federal Reserve Board men who will perform the functions which those members of the board now possess, although the men who are to perform those functions hold offices that do not require confirmation. Let the Senate understand now that they are striking down the checks and safeguards that they placed around the Federal Reserve Board. It is no answer to say that these powers will never be exercised, and hence they should be granted, for if they will never be exercised, then they should never be granted. It is mere nonsense to say that a power ought to be granted because it is never going to be exercised.

Mr. President, if you pass this bill without amendment, I say to you that there need never be another name sent to the Senate for confirmation in the executive or administrative department of this Government, because by the simple process of naming a man for an office which does not require confirmation and then transferring to him the functions and powers and duties of an office that does require confirmation the necessity of ever sending a name here for confirmation is obviated.

No one opposes this bill for the narrow reason that he seeks to hamper the President of the United States. Speaking for myself, I do not oppose it because I doubt the wisdom or the patriotism of the present occupant of the White House. I oppose it for the greater reason that it undermines the fundamentals of our governmental structure.

When the people ordained the Constitution they created a system of checks and balances. It was not to be a government of one mind, but a government in the operation of which many minds were to cooperate. When the Continental Congress began the creation of the statutory machinery of government the same principles were adhered to. From that day to this we have distributed power; not to one judge but to many judges; not to one man constituting a department but to several men. To this end we have created the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, the Farm Loan Board, the Shipping Board, the Federal Trade Commission, and many other boards and tribunals; not because we doubted the wisdom of the President, but because it is recognized a great Government must act through numerous agencies, and that a concert of opinion is essential in any Government based upon the will of the people. It is the very life of democracy. It is one great principle which distinguishes a democracy from an autocracy—the rule of the people over the rule of a despot.

This, therefore, is not a question of individuals. The proposition involved is a system of government. If we are to maintain the old traditions, if we are to hand down unimpaired those ideals of government that came to us from our fathers, we must reject, or at least greatly amend, this bill.

Always remember that if this emergency is made the occasion for breaking down constitutional safeguards or for disregarding principles upon which our Government is grounded, that a precedent will be established which in evil days may be applied for evil purposes. To-day we declare that the emergency of a great war makes it necessary to do an unprecedented thing; thereupon we act, although the reason is not made manifest by those who demand that action be taken. But when this war is over and the turmoil and economic disturbances inevitable shall come upon us, who will say that other men will not employ this precedent and declare that another emergency exists before which all principles of government must give way?

It is very easy to destroy all principles; it is very hard to reestablish them.

While I am willing to concentrate in the Executive every power necessary to carry on this war, I do protest against striking down all that code of laws that has been created for a hundred years—striking down those checks and safeguards that have been set up as the century has run its course—and in one fell swoop, and without any reason whatever being assigned, consigning all of the safeguards of the past to oblivion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Baird	Harding	Myers	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Henderson	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Norris	Sterling
Colt	Hollis	Nugent	Swanson
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thompson
Curtis	Kellogg	Phelan	Townsend
Dillingham	King	Pittman	Trammell
Fall	Kirby	Poindexter	Underwood
Fletcher	Knox	Reed	Vardaman
France	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Lewis	Shafroth	Walsh
Gallinger	McCumber	Sheppard	Warren
Gore	McKellar	Sherman	Watson
Gronna	McLean	Shields	Williams
Guion	McNary	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have observed with some regret, during the course of the discussion, a tendency to be unduly impatient of opposition to the bill as reported from the committee. Not alone in this body but outside of it a disposition to question the motives and to challenge the good faith and loyalty of all who advocate amendments which are designed to eliminate from or add to the substance of the bill.

Mr. President, if the Senate possesses any function prominent above all others, it is the need for careful and close consideration of bills proposing new legislation; and unless we exercise that function to the best of our ability we may not only prove unequal to the trust imposed upon us but our inaction may be productive of evil consequences to the people whose servants we are.

Mr. President, I am a supporter of this administration—a hearty, unqualified, uncompromising, and persistent supporter. I was an advocate of the policies of the President of the United States before he was elected to that high position, and one of the first to espouse his candidacy for it. What I may have to say concerning this amendment can not therefore be successfully assailed either as an attempt to thwart the purposes of the administration or to hinder the President in the effective prosecution of policies designed to win this war.

Mr. President, this is a very important bill, one of great magnitude and of far-reaching importance. I am disposed to support it, somewhat against my convictions, because it seems to be so urgently demanded as an essential to the crisis with which we are now confronted; and yet, Mr. President, I can not lend my assent to its enactment as it stands, if by one or two appropriate and what seem to me to be necessary amendments we can eliminate from its operation two or three of the great administrative institutions of the Government.

Mr. President, I am not at all afraid of the manner in which the President will exercise his great powers under this bill. I am satisfied with the assurances which I am told he has given to the Senator having charge of the bill regarding the subject matter of this and one or two other proposed amendments. But, as was just said by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], we are legislating for the future. We are legislating in affairs of government. Administrations change; Presidents come and go; but the Republic goes on, I trust, forever.

We should be wholly impersonal in our consideration of measures like this and act as convictions of duty demand. There is nothing certain in this world, said an old philosopher, but death and taxes. Nothing has been so uncertain since this war began as human life. The President may, and I trust will be, with us during the remainder of his term. I trust he will enjoy many happy years after he shall have laid down the cares and prerogatives of his office. But we do not know. We do not know how long this war will last. My own belief, from present indications, is that it will be of indefinite duration and that the struggle between autocracy and democracy will extend through many years to come. We must take all these things into consideration, Mr. President, whenever the personal equation is invoked in behalf of any legislative program.

Now, what is proposed by this amendment? Simply the elimination from the operation of the terms of the bill of a very important governmental function, one whose disturbance, however great the exigencies of the country, may result in immediate injury or ultimate disaster to our financial system. The time may come when, with the best of intentions, whoever may occupy the presidential office, may under the terms of this bill be advised and consider it his duty to make important changes, possibly eliminating the Federal Reserve Board from all the activities conferred upon it by law, and the same is true of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Indeed, Mr. President, with regard to that body and some of the functions with which it is clothed, I can very readily foresee the possibility of an early conflict with the administration. We have in the railroad law enacted some weeks ago continued to that body the power of review over changes of rates which were proposed by the administration in its operation of the railroad system of the United States.

If in the exercise of that power serious differences should arise between the rate-making authority where it is now vested and the right to review that authority as we have continued it, an issue directly affecting the conduct of the war in the opinion of the administrative authority might present itself. In that event, in all probability, if the commission be not excepted from the bill, a transference of the rate-making power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to some other functionary or functionaries for the time being or during the course of the war would very probably be made, and that in my opinion would be most unfortunate. It was precisely to guard against the placing of the rate-fixing power in the hands of one man absolutely that Congress in its wisdom continued the revisory rate-making functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Why, then, should we not eliminate that commission from the operation of this bill? To do otherwise will be to make the legislation already enacted and upon which this body insisted potentially nugatory.

It is said by the Senator having charge of the bill that the proviso of section 2, which reads, "Provided, That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war," makes interference with the Federal Reserve Board or with the Interstate Commerce Commission impossible, because neither of them can by any possibility relate to the conduct of the war. Why not? Mr. President, nearly every bill introduced in either House at this session of Congress has contained in its title or as a recital that its purpose is to promote the prosecution of the war, or that it is necessary to the successful conduct of the war. Indeed, in the preparation of bills in the last few months that phrase has become a formula. Hence, I can not understand or accept the assertion of the Senator from North Carolina that because of this proviso there can be no relation between these two bodies, or either of them, and the proper conduct of the war.

But if the Senator is right it will do no harm to insert these two amendments, for certainly if there can be established no relation between them and the conduct of the war then no objection whatever can be made to them. They will, in any event, be harmless.

My colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] the other day, in a most illuminating speech, emphasized the tremendous importance of our banking system to the prosecution of the war, his argument being that, because of that fact, it should not be excluded from the operations of the bill. Here, then, we find two supporters of the same measure differing radically upon a tremendously important subject. Both these Senators are excellent lawyers, and if there be such a radical divergence of opinion between them regarding the relation of the Federal Reserve Board to the conduct of the war, certainly we should provide in a cautionary way against the possibility that the Senator from Colorado may be right and the Senator from North Carolina may be wrong.

Mr. President, this amendment addresses itself, to my mind, as being eminently proper and desirable, and in view of the vastly beneficial functions of the Federal Reserve Board, in view of the conceded fact that the act creating it is one of the great monuments of congressional legislation, that it has not only supplied a needed want but has become a precedent for banking legislation the world over, I trust that nothing save the direst of dire necessities may subject it to any possibility of outside interference or of suspension.

Let me add before I take my seat that inasmuch as this Congress has at all times since the outbreak of the war manifested itself summarily, freely, and without qualification in favor of everything that the administration has deemed necessary for the proper prosecution of the war, should the emergency contemplated by my colleague present itself it would require but a very short time indeed for the Senate and the House to give the needed power to meet and overcome it.

Moreover, Mr. President, the power vested in the President—the power of removal and appointment—to change the personnel of both these boards and reconstitute them to his purposes is ample for any contingency so far feared or prophesied. That power exists. It is conceded. Why should we, then, delay the passage of this bill by objecting to these exceptions, which, in my judgment, are quite as essential to the bill as the bill seems to be to the due prosecution of the war?

Mr. SHAFROTH obtained the floor.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is withdrawn.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I did not expect to say anything further with relation to the bill, but the controversy that has arisen in the last two or three speeches impels me to say a few words with regard to it.

I supposed it was conceded that in order to prosecute a war successfully we had to have concentration of power. If any Senator does not believe that, then, of course, he should vote against this bill. All of these bills creating independent bureaus with their checks and balances have been framed and enacted for the purpose of being administered in times of peace. These safeguards are most necessary in times of peace. But in times of war there arise in the various bureaus of the Government certain conflicts of opinion which produce discussion and delay, and it is those delays which sometimes are fatal to the successful prosecution of the war.

If we regard this war as a conflict not of great importance, then, of course, it is all right to contend that the President should have no more power than he now possesses. Examine the arguments that have been made in the last hour and a half and you will find that the objections which are made to the Federal Reserve System being brought within the operation of this act can be repeated as to every department of the Government, except perhaps the War and Navy Departments. If you exclude all but those two departments it seems to me that you are going to impair the ability of the President to properly prosecute the war.

Every department has a close relation to the war. Its powers can be either made to aid or assist at a most vital time in the prosecution of the war or they may hinder and delay the prosecution thereof. There is not a single department in the Government that is not related to the prosecution of the war, and there is not a single one that compares in the importance of such relation to the Federal Reserve System, which is now made the subject of discussion by reason of the amendment offered to exclude it from the operation of the proposed law.

Mr. President, if we are going simply to confer upon the President insignificant powers it will not aid or assist. I take it that democracies have never been able effectively to prosecute war until they granted during the war autocratic power. They have these checks and balances which are in peace times so important to the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people, but which become obstructions when the existence of the Nation becomes imperiled.

Mr. President, what is this Federal Reserve System, which some have said has no relation whatever to the war? The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] made the assertion that it was possessed of powers that no one could suggest could have any relation whatever to the war. He seemed to concede the principle of the necessity of concentration of power in times of war, for he said he believed in giving the President all the power necessary, but that he did not believe in giving power as to those bureaus that have no connection whatever with the prosecution of the war.

What is the situation with relation to the Federal Reserve System? There is no agency on earth that is more potent and powerful in the prosecution of a war than finances and the management thereof. There is nothing whatever which can be devised that will aid more or hinder more the prosecution of a war than the administration of finances.

We know that the Government keeps large quantities of money in the vaults of these Federal reserve banks. Suppose the officers of one of them should say, "We will not honor or cash any drafts or any checks that may be drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury for the prosecution of this war." Would not that action have some connection with the war? Would it not be possible for a bureau, clothed with a power of that kind, to have some influence upon either the prosecution or the retarding of the war? It is clear that a bureau which has such an important control over the finances of the Government in time of war becomes a most powerful agency for the purpose of ending the war or for the purpose of hindering the prosecution of the war.

It may be said, Mr. President, that the Federal reserve bank that would refuse to honor the checks of the Government could be forced to do so by a writ of mandamus. That is true; but you must remember the law's delays exist in this day as well as they did in Shakespeare's time. If we intend to clothe the President with power, should we except any independent bureau which could prevent the execution of the power that might be necessary for winning the war?

What may be said as to the Federal Reserve System may be said as to every one of the bureaus of the Government. If you are going to exempt one, it casts a reflection upon the others that remain under the operation of the system.

Mr. President, it is a question as to whether we regard this war as an important one, whether we regard it as essential that our powers should be concentrated. If we do not, then we ought to vote against this bill. We ought to vote against it if we think that in these times we ought to adhere to the checks and safeguards so essential in time of peace that have been thrown around the administration of all the bureaus. But if we believe that this is a great war, that the very life and existence of the Nation is dependent upon it, then the existence of the Government should be considered more important than that of any bureau thereof, and we should clothe our Commander in Chief with the power of removing any officer who stands in the way. With that power, Mr. President, we can have an effective prosecution of the war, and without it we can not. These independent boards, acting sometimes inadvertently and sometimes in the exercise of what they think is a power which should be exercised, will cause a hindrance, a delay, which may in its effect produce the loss of the war.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I maintain that every one of these bureaus ought to be brought within the operation of the law, and I am opposed to excepting any of them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, in listening to the argument of the distinguished Senator who has just taken his seat I judge he has reached the conclusion that it is necessary to put the power carried in this bill in the hands of the Chief Executive lest there may be disloyalty in officials holding subordinate positions in the Government. I think the Senator is in error. I do not believe there is a man who holds high position under a commission from the President of the United States who is not loyal to the Government, but should such prove to be the case there is a way and a speedy way to dispose of a case of that kind.

Mr. President, we are on the battle line. All that we have, all that we hold dear, all that we cherish to our hearts is at stake on the battle fields of France, and no man is entitled to call himself an American citizen, no man is entitled to look his neighbor in the face, no man is entitled to live within the domain of this great country who is not loyal to the flag and prepared to support his country's call to the last degree.

But, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I draw a marked distinction between being loyal to my country and feeling that I must obey the behest of every direction that may come from Executive authority. It is my desire and purpose to support the President of the United States in his great office, to aid and uphold the hands of his administrative officers, but I do not hold allegiance to the President of the United States. I do not hold allegiance to any subordinate officer. I hold my allegiance to my country and its flag, and I reserve the right to myself when legislation comes before the Congress to determine for myself whether my higher loyalty requires me to support or negative legislation as I may determine whether it is for the best interest of the great cause that our troops are fighting for to-day.

I am disposed to support the bill that is now pending before the Senate, but I am not willing to say that I intend to stand here and vote for legislation that is laid before the Senate without consideration on my part, and without a determination on my part as to what I believe is the best interest of my country and the constituency that I represent.

This bill would be considered drastic legislation if it was not that we are involved in the war, and yet, Mr. President, I would be willing to vote for a measure of this kind in times of peace within prescribed limitations. I know and you know that there are numerous branches of the Government that are not functioning and have not been doing so, so far as an aid to the Government and the people of the United States, for some years past. I mean effectively and efficiently and capably. I know and you know the difficulties that confront the Congress when it seeks to wipe out bureaus or abolish divisions or change the executive branch of the Government. It is a most difficult undertaking, because men differ and influences differ, and without the aid and advice of the Executive it is most difficult of accomplishing. I think if the President of the United States had the time to do so, great good could be accomplished for the people of the United States in a reorganization of many of the bureaus and divisions of the Government of the United States to-day, not only those that relate to war endeavor but also those that relate purely to the civil side of the Government.

I believe that the war branch of the Government does need reorganization. I hope under the terms of this bill the President will give it a thorough and a quick reorganization. I believe there are some governmental operations on the civil side of the Government that could be reorganized most effectively and beneficially for the people of the United States at this time. But, Mr. President, that being true, I do not see that that fact compels me to tear down the entire fabric of government, to pull away the pillars from the temple and let them fall to earth and ask the Executive to rebuild the shrine of our Government from top to bottom.

There are certain governmental endeavors that, it seems to me, clearly it is the part of wisdom to keep out of this bill. It has been said here that the President would not interfere with them. Probably that is true, and why is it probably true? Because part of them have just been remodeled by the Congress at the request of the Executive.

But the business life of this Nation rests primarily on two functions. One is banking and finance and the other is transportation. Pull down the pillars of the temple of Government that support the great banking and financial institutions of the country at one end and then destroy the pillar that upholds the checks and balances of the transportation system of America at the other end, and the business fabric of the Nation will fall to earth and a panic will ensue before you can again establish it.

Those who advocate this bill say that it must pass without amendment. Who has a right to come before the Senate of the United States, representing the sovereign States of this Union, and say to this august body that they bear a message that we must pass legislation as it is handed to us or not pass it at all? Is that necessary for us to do in order to maintain our loyalty to our country, our devotion to our Government? Not at all, in my judgment. I think the primary duty of the Senate of the United States is to uphold the Government, to be loyal to the country, to maintain the armies in the field; but I think that result can be more effectively and securely accomplished by the Senate of the United States voicing its own opinion, using its own judgment, and reflecting the legislative will of the people, and not by adopting the mandate of subordinate officials of the Government.

Why should we not adopt the pending amendment? The pending amendment merely proposes to exempt from the terms of this general reorganization bill the Federal Reserve Board, a board but recently created by the Congress of the United States and but recently approved by the Chief Executive of the land. More than that, the ink is hardly dry on the signature of the President to a bill approved on the 5th day of April, 1918, creating a War Finance Corporation, which is an amendment to the Federal Reserve Board act, changing and increasing the powers of that board, a bill recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, in order that he might carry out the war purposes of the Government on the financial side. The very purpose of the legislation creating the War Finance Corporation was to reorganize the Federal Reserve Board, so that it could cooperate in every way with the war necessities of the Government. That legislation has been approved by the President of the United States; indeed, it met with his approval before it was passed. Its enactment was urged on the Congress by the Chief Executive and by the Secretary of the Treasury. No man can arise in his seat on the floor of the Senate and say that that amendment to the Federal Reserve Board act was not the legislation that the executive branch of the Government thought necessary and wise at the time to take care of the situation. It was passed as the President wanted it; it was passed under his urgent request. It is known; the people of America know what it is; the banking interests of America know what it is; the borrowing interests of America know what it is. It is fixed; it is known. Business men can move along, knowing what conditions they have to face from the governmental side and knowing the men with whom they have to deal.

Is there a Senator of the United States who is willing to stand in his place in the Senate and say that any of the men to whom we have given these great powers of finance are disloyal to the Government? If so, let him stand up and proclaim it here. Is there any Senator of the United States who is prepared to say in this presence that there is any man to whom the President has given the great powers under the Federal Reserve Board act and the War Finance Corporation act who is inefficient and incapable of carrying on the functions that are intrusted to him, or that the Chief Executive believes he is incapable of carrying on those functions? If there is, let us know it now; now is the hour, and now is the time to find it out. If you want to remove a man for inefficiency or for disloyalty, and that is the purpose of your legislation, tell us so; but if you can not tell us so, then let that argument pass aside forever; if that is not so, if we have on the statute books the exact legislation with reference to banking, currency, and finance that the Executive has asked, and we have in office the men appointed by the President of the United States to carry out these functions, whom the President believes are loyal and honest—and I am going to assume that they are loyal and honest and efficient, as no Senator on this floor is prepared to deny the fact—then we should adopt the amendment and not leave our financial status in the realm of doubt.

That legislation was born of yesterday; the officers are appointed by the President of the United States. I am going to vote to try out that legislation and let it stand where it is without amendment by Executive order and not by sanction of the representatives of the people in the Congress of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a quorum here. The Chair will take judicial notice of the fact that there is a quorum here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who is unavoidably absent. I have been requested by him to preserve the pair on this vote, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], but on this vote I am released, and therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], which I transfer to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when the name of Mr. WEEKS was called). My colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. If present, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM. Has the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is detained on important public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment of the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. REED. Before the vote is announced I desire to raise a point of order. The point of order is that the record will show that before the calling of the roll a Senator arose in his place and duly raised the question of the lack of a quorum. Under the rules of the Senate, followed without variation for many years, that demand should have been followed by a roll call to disclose the presence of a quorum without the interjection of other business. The Chair disregarded and overruled the point or the request, and proceeded to put the Senate immediately to a vote. That being the case, I maintain that the present vote was taken at a time when it could not be properly taken, because the only business that could be transacted by the Senate was the call of the roll to disclose a quorum, and not the call of the roll upon a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair announced to the Senator from North Carolina that there was a quorum present. The Senator from North Carolina thereupon did not insist upon the calling of the roll to disclose a quorum, and the Chair assumed it was with the consent of the Senator from North Carolina that he failed to order the calling of the roll. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. To save the record, because I know it will not change the situation, the Chair announced in substance, as I heard his language—I may have incorrectly heard him—that he observed the presence of a quorum.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say that I did suggest the absence of a quorum, because there were some Senators absent who I thought ought to be here, but the Vice President found as a fact that a quorum was present, and I had no more to say. I did not actually insist on it; I was willing to go on.

Mr. GALLINGER. How could the Vice President find it as a fact?

Mr. OVERMAN. He saw more than a quorum here; there was no question about that.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the rule specifies how we shall proceed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will ask the Senator from Missouri to read the rule under which he makes the point. I think it is well in acting on this matter to have the exact language of the rule before us.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say that, whatever there is in the point of order, it comes too late. The point of order should have been made before we started to vote on a call for the yeas and nays, and not after we had voted. That was the proper time to make the point, and on that ground alone the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. ASHURST. I rise to a point of order. Nothing is proper at this time under our rules except the excusing of a Senator from the duty of voting or the announcement of the result.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to have my point determined first, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of this opinion—the Chair will state it all again—the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] rose and suggested the absence of a quorum. The Chair said he would take judicial notice that there was a quorum present; that was the exact language. There was no objection made——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Chair think that was a legitimate parliamentary ruling?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair does not think so; the Chair ought not to have done it, but the Chair did do it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was in the Chamber giving reasonable attention, but before I had any time to understand what had taken place the roll call proceeded and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] had voted on the call of his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If this has to be a personal controversy between the Chair and the Senator from Missouri, it will be. There was no appeal from the ruling of the Chair; the request was then made for the yeas and nays, and the Senator from Missouri voted to second the request for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. I desire to say——

Mr. ASHURST. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. REED. I desire to say, as a matter of personal privilege, and the highest personal privilege——

Mr. ASHURST. I make the point of order that nothing is in order at this time except a declaration of the result or the excusing of a Senator from voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already ruled on the point of order, and has overruled it.

Mr. REED. And, as a question of high personal privilege, I want to say to the President of the Senate, for whom I have the utmost respect, that he was never more mistaken in his life than when he states that I voted in favor or held up my hand to second the demand for the yeas and nays. He is simply in error, because the roll call was started before I was really aware of the fact. Now, I want to say, solely for the RECORD, and then I shall take my seat, that no Senator is obliged to be standing on guard lest a rule should be broken, a rule that has long been held to be sacred. That rule, if I may be pardoned for just a moment, is:

> If, at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate, a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate.

But since the President of the Senate has stated that his action was irregular, and therefore I take it it can never be employed as a precedent, I do not desire further to insist upon the point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, now, the Chair has tried for five years to be a decent, respectable, and fair presiding officer for this body——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now the Chair is going to take a hand. The Chair did a thing he had not any right to do, and every Senator knew that the Chair had not any right to do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Chair allow me to say a word?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair respectfully requests unanimous consent at the hands of the Senate to set aside this roll call and all that has occurred and to let him order a call for a quorum.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not object to that, except that I wish to say——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object; and, if I am in order, I wish to state why I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an objection. The Senator from Missouri has withdrawn his appeal from the decision of the Chair. On the amendment of the Senator from Georgia the yeas are 37 and the nays are 41. The amendment is rejected.

The result of the roll call was as follows:

YEAS—37.

Borah	Gronna	Lodge	Sterling
Brandegee	Hale	McCumber	Thomas
Chamberlain	Harding	New	Townsend
Cummins	Hardwick	Norris	Underwood
Curtis	Hitchcock	Page	Vardaman
Dillingham	Johnson, Cal.	Poindexter	Wadsworth
France	Kellogg	Reed	Watson
Frelinghuysen	King	Sherman
Gallinger	Knox	Smith, Ga.
Gore	Lenroot	Smoot

NAYS—41.

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Swanson
Baird	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Thompson
Bankhead	Kirby	Pittman	Tillman
Beckham	Lewis	Saulsbury	Trammell

NOT VOTING—17.

Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Sutherland
Fall	Kendrick	Pomerene	Weeks
Fernald	Kenyon	Ransdell
Goff	La Follette	Robinson
James	Owen	Smith, Mich.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say what I started to say a moment ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I am not out of order, I should like to say a word, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator speaks, he will speak on the bill; and the Chair does not know whether he has spoken on it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a statement. I did not object; I said I would not object; but I should have made the point that a quorum had been previously called for, and since it had been called no business had intervened between that time and the second suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is about the point that I wanted to make, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I move the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of section 1 of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 1 the following proviso:

Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall not extend to the functions, duties, or powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate very long upon the amendment. I am not the especial champion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, as has been suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. It has often made decisions with which I did not agree; a part of its membership did not command my approval upon the vote for confirmation; but nevertheless, Mr. President, I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission has played an important part in the economy of the United States and has administered justice with fair success among its people. I desire to resume, merely for restatement, the reasons which I was giving when my time expired upon a former occasion for the retention of the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, there yet remain in the commission two great, vital, important functions: First, the power of fixing rates for the general commerce of the people. I agree that this power is somewhat impaired by the bill which we recently passed, known as the railroad act, but it is still of vast consequence to those who believe in fair and reasonable rates for the service rendered by the common carriers.

The second function—and I should like Senators to give especial attention to this point—the second function which remains with the Interstate Commerce Commission is the valuation of the railway properties of the country. In that work the commission has been engaged for something like three and one-half years; it has progressed to a point at which some railroads, not many, have been completed so far as the work of the bureau of valuation is concerned, and with respect to all the railroads a vast investigation has been made and a very large part of all the evidence accumulated.

In our hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee upon the railroad bill the Chief of the Bureau of Valuation, a man of the highest accomplishments and of the most perfect honesty and fidelity—I refer to Judge Prouty—said to us, as I remember, that the work of valuation, the work of taking the testimony and arranging it, could be finished in a year, and that it was possible that the entire duty of the commission in that respect could be completed in two years.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to just what the commission has been doing and what it is authorized to do under the law. I read from the act of March 1, 1913, which authorized the valuation:

First. In such investigation said commission shall ascertain and report in detail as to each piece of property owned or used by said common carrier for its purposes as a common carrier, the original cost to date, the cost of reproduction new, the cost of reproduction less depreciation, and an analysis of the methods by which these several costs are obtained, and the reason for their differences, if any. The commission shall in like manner ascertain and report separately other values, and elements of value, if any, of the property of such common carrier, and an analysis of the methods of valuation employed, and of the reasons for any differences between any such value, and each of the foregoing cost values.

Second. Such investigation and report shall state in detail and separately from improvements the original cost of all lands, rights of way, and terminals owned or used for the purposes of a common carrier, and ascertained as of the time of dedication to public use, and the present value of the same, and separately the original and present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of such original cost or present value.

Third. Such investigation and report shall show separately the property held for purposes other than those of a common carrier, and the original cost and present value of the same, together with an analysis of the methods of valuation employed.

Other items of information are required, which I need not read. I ask that the entire act to which I have referred may be inserted as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The act referred to is as follows:

An act (H. R. 22593) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof by providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto, and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended by adding thereto a new section, to be known as section 19a, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 19a. That the commission shall, as hereinafter provided, investigate, ascertain, and report the value of all the property owned or used by every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act. To enable the commission to make such investigation and report it is authorized to employ such experts and other assistants as may be necessary. The commission may appoint examiners who shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and take testimony. The commission shall make an inventory which shall list the property of every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act in detail, and show the value thereof as hereinafter provided, and shall classify the physical property, as nearly as practicable, in conformity with the classification of expenditures for road and equipment, as prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"First. In such investigation said commission shall ascertain and report in detail as to each piece of property owned or used by said common carrier for its purposes as a common carrier, the original cost to date, the cost of reproduction new, the cost of reproduction less depreciation, and an analysis of the methods by which these several costs are obtained, and the reason for their differences, if any. The commission shall in like manner ascertain and report separately other values, and elements of value, if any, of the property of such common carrier, and an analysis of the methods of valuation employed, and of the reasons for any differences between any such value, and each of the foregoing cost values.

"Second. Such investigation and report shall state in detail and separately from improvements the original cost of all lands, rights of way, and terminals owned or used for the purposes of a common carrier, and ascertained as of the time of dedication to public use, and the present value of the same, and separately the original and present cost of condemnation and damages or of purchase in excess of such original cost or present value.

"Third. Such investigation and report shall show separately the property held for purposes other than those of a common carrier, and the original cost and present value of the same, together with an analysis of the methods of valuation employed.

"Fourth. In ascertaining the original cost to date of the property of such common carrier the commission, in addition to such other elements as it may deem necessary, shall investigate and report upon the history and organization of the present and of any previous corporation operating such property; upon any increases or decreases of stocks, bonds, or other securities in any reorganization; upon moneys received by any such corporation by reason of any issues of stocks, bonds, or other securities; upon the syndicating, banking, and other financial arrangements under which such issues were made and the expense thereof; and upon the net and gross earnings of such corporations; and shall also ascertain and report in such detail as may be determined by the commission upon the expenditure of all moneys and the purposes for which the same were expended.

"Fifth. The commission shall ascertain and report the amount and value of any aid, gift, grant of right of way, or donation, made to any such common carrier, or to any previous corporation operating such property, by the Government of the United States or by any State, county, or municipal government, or by individuals, associations, or corporations; and it shall also ascertain and report the grants of land to any such common carrier, or any previous corporation operating such property, by the Government of the United States or by any State, county, or municipal government, and the amount of money derived from the sale of any portion of such grants and the value of the unsold portion thereof at the time acquired and at the present time; also the amount and value of any concession and allowance made by such common carrier to the Government of the United States or to any State, county, or municipal government in consideration of such aid, gift, grant, or donation.

"Except as herein otherwise provided, the commission shall have power to prescribe the method of procedure to be followed in the conduct of the investigation, the form in which the results of the valuation shall be submitted, and the classification of the elements that constitute the ascertained value, and such investigation shall show the value of the property of every common carrier as a whole and separately the value of its property in each of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, classified and in detail as herein required.

"Such investigation shall be commenced within 60 days after the approval of this act and shall be prosecuted with diligence and thoroughness, and the result thereof reported to Congress at the beginning of each regular session thereafter until completed.

"Every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall furnish to the commission or its agents, from time to time and as the commission may require, maps, profiles, contracts, reports of engineers, and any other documents, records, and papers, or copies of any or all of the same, in aid of such investigation and determination of the value of the property of said common carrier, and shall grant to all agents of the commission free access to its right of way, its property, and its accounts, records, and memoranda whenever and wherever requested by any such duly authorized agent, and every common carrier is hereby directed and required to cooperate with and aid the commission in the work of the valuation of its property in such further particulars and to such extent as the commission may require and direct, and all rules and regulations made by the commission for the purpose of administering the provisions of this section and section 20 of this act shall have the full force and effect of law. Unless otherwise ordered by the commission, with the reasons therefor, the records and data of the commission shall be open to the inspection and examination of the public.

"Upon the completion of the valuation herein provided for the commission shall thereafter in like manner keep itself informed of all extensions and improvements or other changes in the condition and value of the property of all common carriers, and shall ascertain the value thereof, and shall from time to time revise and correct its valuations, showing such revision and correction classified and as a whole and separately in each of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia, which valuations, both original and corrected, shall be tentative valuations and shall be reported to Congress at the beginning of each regular session.

"To enable the commission to make such changes and corrections in its valuations of each class of property, every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall make such reports and furnish such information as the commission may require.

"Whenever the commission shall have completed the tentative valuation of the property of any common carrier, as herein directed, and before such valuation shall become final, the commission shall give notice by registered letter to the said carrier, the Attorney General of the United States, the governor of any State in which the property so valued is located, and to such additional parties as the commission may prescribe, stating the valuation placed upon the several classes of property of said carrier, and shall allow 30 days in which to file a protest of the same with the commission. If no protest is filed within 30 days, said valuation shall become final as of the date thereof.

"If notice of protest is filed the commission shall fix a time for hearing the same, and shall proceed as promptly as may be to hear and consider any matter relative and material thereto which may be presented in support of any such protest so filed as aforesaid. If after hearing any protest of such tentative valuation under the provisions of this act the commission shall be of the opinion that its valuation should not become final, it shall make such changes as may be necessary, and shall issue an order making such corrected tentative valuation final as of the date thereof. All final valuations by the commission and the classification thereof shall be published and shall be prima facie evidence of the value of the property in all proceedings under the act to regulate commerce as of the date of the fixing thereof, and in all judicial proceedings for the enforcement of the act approved February 4, 1887, commonly known as 'the act to regulate commerce,' and the various acts amendatory thereof, and in all judicial proceedings brought to enjoin, set aside, annul, or suspend, in whole or in part, any order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"If upon the trial of any action involving a final value fixed by the commission, evidence shall be introduced regarding such value which is found by the court to be different from that offered upon the hearing before the commission, or additional thereto and substantially affecting said value, the court, before proceeding to render judgment shall transmit a copy of such evidence to the commission, and shall stay further proceedings in said action for such time as the court shall determine from the date of such transmission. Upon the receipt of such evidence the commission shall consider the same and may fix a final value different from the one fixed in the first instance, and may alter, modify, amend, or rescind any order which it has made involving said final value, and shall report its action thereon to said court within the time fixed by the court. If the commission shall alter, modify, or amend its order, such altered, modified, or amended order shall take the place of the original order complained of and judgment shall be rendered thereon as though made by the commission in the first instance. If the original order shall not be rescinded or changed by the commission, judgment shall be rendered upon such original order.

"The provisions of this section shall apply to receivers of carriers and operating trustees. In case of failure or refusal on the part of any carrier, receiver, or trustee to comply with all the requirements of this section and in the manner prescribed by the commission such carrier, receiver, or trustee shall forfeit to the United States the sum of $500 for each such offense and for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, such forfeitures to be recoverable in the same manner as other forfeitures provided for in section 16 of the act to regulate commerce.

"That the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, upon the application of the Attorney General of the United States at the request of the commission, alleging a failure to comply with or a violation of any of the provisions of this section by any common carrier, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus commanding such common carrier to comply with the provisions of this section."

Approved, March 1, 1913.

Mr. CUMMINS. A more important work than is now being carried forward by the Interstate Commerce Commission in this respect was never entered upon by any body or function of the Government. It matters not whether we finally adopt the policy of Government ownership, or whether we continue in the former system of regulating and controlling the charges to be made by the carriers for the service they render. In either event, the conclusions which the Interstate Commerce Commission shall finally reach are absolutely necessary to the determination, first, of the value of the property, if we shall conclude to become its owners; or, second, the rates that shall be charged for the service, if we continue the system of mere regulation and control.

The magnitude of this work can hardly be conceived by those who are not familiar with what has been done by the commission. Hundreds of engineers and accountants and examiners have been diligently at work during these three years and a half in order to enable the commission finally to complete the duty which we devolved upon it in 1913. I should like to ask whether the sponsor for this bill believes that this function of the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon which it has gone so far, ought to be transferred to any other body, commission, bureau, or officer? I should like to know whether he believes it would help the country in the successful prosecution of the war to take away from the Interstate Commerce Commission this function and transfer it to some one else who might be selected for that purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. Only for a question, because my time is so limited. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is merely a question. I wanted to ask the Senator what provision in this bill gave him any reason to suppose that this mere administrative work of arriving at a certain result in a certain investigation ordered by Congress could be interferred with by the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. I gather that impression simply by reading the bill. The bill says that the President shall be authorized to transfer from any department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer any power or duty or function heretofore granted to any other department, commission, bureau, office, or officer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator's response is not an answer to my question. Does the Senator really believe that under the provisions of this bill there would or could be, and especially that there would be, any attempt to take away this mere investigation work from these men who have started on it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I believe it could be done, and I fear that it would be done. I know that there is a movement on foot now to do it. I do not speak unadvisedly about it. I know that there began a short while ago a propaganda to prevent further appropriations for the continuance of this work. I know that this propaganda ceased and in its stead there was substituted a movement for the transfer of this duty on the part of the commission to some other officer or body of the Government. I do not suggest that the President of the United States is a part of that movement, but I do know that the influences, both for and against, which are always aroused when a subject of this sort is brought before either Congress or the people, are now at work. So I answer the Senator from Mississippi by saying that I do not charge or even intimate that the President would do anything that, in his opinion, was not best for the country; but I do know that those who are around him, those who naturally give voice to their convictions and their sentiments when anything of this sort is before the Congress or the people, desire that this power shall be taken away from the Interstate Commerce Commission and vested in some other officer or other body selected by the President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not yield further, because I must conclude what I have to say, and my time is very short.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I just wanted to ask one other question, as to the Senator's sources of information.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Mississippi can speak in his own time if he desires to do it; and I do not refuse to yield out of any discourtesy.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I know that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I simply want to finish what I have to say.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that perfectly well; but, still, I should have liked very much to follow the Senator's inferences one step further.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to call attention to the fact that this is a function of the Interstate Commerce Commission which, when performed, can not be recalled. This bill is for the period of the war; but if this work is finished by some one else within the next two years, that controls times of peace as well as times of war. When the valuation of these properties is concluded, it matters not how soon peace shall come; it matters not how effectually, by the terms of this bill, the status which now exists is restored; the valuation will have been made, it will have been made under the law, and it will control and regulate and determine the things it was intended to determine when the law was passed.

We can not regard this as a war measure in that respect. It has nothing whatever to do with war in any other sense than that described by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], who believes—and many other people believe—that every activity, every energy, every part of every life in America has relation to the war. But I ask Senators now whether they are willing to give the power to transfer this function, which can not assist America in the prosecution of the war, from a board composed of nine eminent, skilled, trained, studied men to any tribunal or to any officer who may be selected to discharge this high and important duty?

I would not be so much concerned if at the end of the war the work done by the person or officer to whom the function is transferred could be obliterated, and if we then could resume the labor which has been going on for the last three and a half or four years, but we can not do that. It will be a judgment entered that can not be set aside. It will remain for all time to have the effect either upon railway rates, if we are adjusting them, or upon the value of the property, if we are acquiring it, that was intended by the act itself.

I earnestly hope, therefore, that this power may not be removed from the safe hands to which it has been intrusted both by Congress and by the President.

There is but one other function which remains to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that is the authority of fixing rates, adjusting rates for the future. Do Senators want to take that power from the Interstate Commerce Commission? We fought that out on the railroad bill, and while I think the legislation we then enacted very seriously, very materially impaired the efficiency of the Interstate Commerce Commission, yet there still remains some power to which the people can appeal if they feel they are aggrieved by the action of the Director General. Does the Senate desire to reverse its action with respect to that important matter—action which occurred only a few days ago?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Iowa has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, however strange and unorthodox it may seem at this moment to make the assertion, I still hazard the assertion that it is not the bounden and sworn duty of a Senator of the United States always to suspect the motives of the executive department upon whom power is sought to be cast; to take it for granted that every power conferred by the legislative upon the executive branch of the Government will be abused, or might be abused, or probably would be abused, is to take it for granted that the American people in electing their Executive have made an enormous mistake.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] says that while he expects it is possible, or even probable, that an act of Congress which requires a certain investigation to be carried to a certain end will be set aside by the President without any express authority of Congress to set it aside, he still "does not accuse the President" of the United States of wanting to do this great wrong. Of course, he does not accuse the President of the United States of wanting to do this or any other great wrong. He dares not. Nobody in America dares do it. He would meet with the reprobation of the entire people of the United States if he dared. Then the Senator turns around and says that somebody is, or some somebodies are, in evidence—or not quite in evidence, either, but in hiding—who might influence the President to do what he says the President would not willfully do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment; then I will yield. I wonder who this somebody is, or who these somebodies are, what are their motives, and what is the evidence upon which the Senator takes it for granted that a thing which he says is so wrong that the President would not do it, is yet of such a character that the President could be prevailed upon to do it anyhow?

Now, I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are a great many people in this country who do not believe it would be wrong to do it; and in view of the President's attitude toward the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the railway bill, or the attitude of his representatives, I am not prepared to say that he is not one of those men who believe that it would be right to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah! Now, then, Mr. President, we have gotten around to this: The Senator a few moments ago asserted in the most positive way that he did not believe the President wanted to do this thing which he says is a great wrong. Now he comes around to the point that he is not prepared to say, but that the President might do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Mississippi might quote me correctly. There was only the lapse of a moment between what I said and what he said. There is a vast difference between saying that I believe the President would do what he believes to be wrong, and saying that I believe he will do wrong from my standpoint.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that is a metaphysical discussion that has been argued out by scholastics years and years ago, as to whether a wrong is subjective or whether it is objective, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will always yield to the Senator, although I am in the same position that he was a moment ago, in that my time is limited.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not interrupt again. I will only illustrate by saying that the Senator from Mississippi very often does what I think is wrong in his vote or in his speech, but I have never known him to do what I believed he believed was wrong. I think the difference is quite plain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; it is not plain, because the Senator has not gone to the point. Frequently I have known the Senator from Iowa to do things that I thought were wrong, and I do not believe I ever knew him to do anything that I thought he thought was wrong, but the question as to whether the thing was wrong or right still remains. It is like Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes's story about the three Thomases—the Thomas that Thomas thought he was, and the Thomas that the boarding house thought Thomas was, and the Thomas that God knew that Thomas was. Right or wrong is not a subjective question at all. You do not make right by thinking it is right. I do not make right by thinking it is right. Right is right because it is right, and wrong is wrong because it is wrong.

Right is a concept of God, not your concept nor mine; although the individual man is perhaps, as Jefferson said, responsible not for the rightfulness but only for the righteousness of his act. But the Senator has already said that he would not make any charge against the President of the United States of doing this thing which in the opinion of the Senator from Iowa is wrong, and therefore which in his opinion is not only subjectively wrong but objectively wrong; and after he has said that the Senator goes on to say that he is a little bit afraid the President may be misguided by somebody, or some somebodies, and the Senator does not tell the Senate who this somebody is, or who these somebodies are.

There are two things to this proposition. The functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission with regard to fixing rates during this war must be set aside, because if we are going to gather all of the railroads of this country together and operate them conjointly with the idea of avoiding duplication and with the idea of making them work in harmony of purpose and unity of action, then, of course, the rates must be harmonized throughout the country. That is not all. Certain rates that apply to products that are absolutely necessary for war purposes must be reduced, and rates upon other and nonessential things must be raised to recoup the loss to the Government and to the railroads because of these reductions. Nobody disputes that the effect of this bill will be to give to the Director General of Railroads the right to fix rates during the war; and if I were appointed Director General, and you did not give me that right as well as the right to fix wages, I would not take the place, because I could not control the railroads. The Senator from Iowa knows that as well as I do. But the Senator goes out afield yet further and goes into an act of Congress directing an investigation and a report as to certain facts of capitalized value, and he says that this act somewhere might, or could, or would, or should, or will, or otherwise, through third parties, might, could, would, or should set aside an act of Congress demanding a certain investigation and a certain report. I say there is nothing at all in this bill that justifies that inference, and I say, moreover, that it does not become me or him, as a Senator of the United States, to take it for granted that because power is lodged in the Executive for a certain purpose it will be abused by applying it to other purposes.

I love the President of the United States personally as well as politically, and far more patriotically and Americanly than I do in either other way. I know he is not going to do anything outside of what he thinks is the intention of this act. He will, through the Director General, change rates wherever it is necessary to carry on the war more efficiently; he will reduce rates upon things that are necessary for the war; he may raise rates on nonessentials in order to recoup the business and make it pay. For example, I received a complaint not long ago that the freight rates on cotton were very high in proportion to the freight rates on wheat crossing the Atlantic Ocean and the freight rates upon certain chemicals crossing the Atlantic Ocean. I wrote back to the constituent who wrote me that that was right at this time, because cotton was not necessary to win the war, and wheat was, and they ought to lower the rates upon wheat as far as they could; and if it was necessary, to make the thing pay, to raise the rates upon cotton and upon other things not absolutely essential to carrying on the war, he and I ought to be patient under it; and he wrote me back, upon receiving my letter, and told me that he thought I was right.

But the Senator ought to know, and I think the Senator upon further thought will know, that the President is going to construe this act according to the intendment of the Congress of the United States, with the sole view of carrying on this war efficiently to a successful issue, and that he is not going out of his way in order to catch up academic questions upon the outside that are totally nonessential to the carrying on of the war. What the Senator has presented is an academic question, totally nonessential to the carrying on of the war. Nobody cares who makes this physical valuation report, and Congress has already designated the men that should make it. I can not even conceive that the President would take the determination of that nonessential and nonwar purpose out of the administrative body of designated men in whose hands it has been reposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I know that there are Members of the Senate absent who desire to say something upon this amendment. They left late in the afternoon, because they believed that the debate would run on, and they desired to have an opportunity to speak upon the amendment. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will allow it to go over until Monday.

Mr. OVERMAN. I would like to comply with the request of the Senator; but this bill has been before the Senate all of this week and all of last week and all of the week before, and Senators ought to stay here. I have accommodated them whenever possible, but I should like to have a vote this afternoon and finish the measure.

Mr. REED. As the Senator refuses to accede to my request, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Guion	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Baird	Hale	Myers	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Henderson	New	Smoot
Borah	Hitchcock	Norris	Sterling
Brandegee	Hollis	Nugent	Swanson
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Thomas
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Thompson
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Tillman

France	Lodge	Sheppard	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sherman	Warren
Gallinger	McKellar	Shields	Watson
Gerry	McLean	Simmons	Williams
Gronna	McNary	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The yeas and nays have been ordered on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and the roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I make the same announcement that I made on the last vote and withhold my vote.

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I did the last time, I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WEEKS's name was called). I make the same announcement as heretofore, that my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. My colleague is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made upon the last vote concerning my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BECKHAM (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and let my vote stand.

I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. JAMES] on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—35.

Brandegee	Gronna	Lodge	Smoot
Chamberlain	Hale	McCumber	Sterling
Cummins	Harding	New	Thomas
Curtis	Hardwick	Norris	Townsend

NOT VOTING—18.

Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Smith, Mich.
Fall	Kendrick	Penrose	Sutherland
Fernald	Kenyon	Pomerene	Weeks
Goff	King	Ransdell
James	La Follette	Robinson

So the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Georgia was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open for further amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. I intended to offer an amendment and occupy some time this afternoon, but it is so late in the evening that I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if we can not adjourn at this time until Monday? I understand that there are a number of other amendments to be offered. I have not occupied a moment of the time of the Senate; but I did want to offer the amendment and to speak at least 20 minutes upon it, and there are quite a number of other amendments that are to be offered. It is Saturday afternoon. I ask the Senator if he will not agree to an adjournment until Monday?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator surprises me when he says that there are a number of amendments to be introduced.

Mr. SMOOT. They have been printed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] has an amendment and also the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has an amendment, and both Senators want to speak on their amendments. Are there any other amendments to be offered?

Mr. SMOOT. There are some amendments printed. I do not know anything about whether they are to be offered or not.

Mr. HALE. I should like to state that I shall propose an amendment.

Mr. STERLING. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from North Carolina that I thought there was an understanding if we secured a vote upon the last amendment we would then adjourn until Monday. I do not know whether any Senators have left the Chamber with that understanding or not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] have amendments which they wish to offer.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to offer several amendments.

RECESS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., Saturday, April 27, 1918) the Senate took a recess until Monday, April 29, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 27, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, how marvelous are the works of Thy hands, how manifold are the ways of Thy providence, how vast are Thy plans and purposes! Open Thou, we pray Thee, our understanding that we may apprehend, and strengthen us for every duty Thou hast laid upon us, that the desires of Thy heart may be fulfilled in us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CASUALTY LISTS.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the gentleman is going to speak about.

Mr. ROGERS. Upon the withholding of the names of the organizations to which soldiers belong in publishing casualty lists.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, in three different cases in the last week in my own city there have been anxious and grieving fathers and mothers, because of the announcement that a certain boy has been dangerously wounded overseas. In each case, after making an investigation here in Washington, I was able to telegraph the fathers and mothers that happily their grief was needless, the error having arisen from the fact that the organization number to which the soldier belonged had not been given in the casualty lists. There was duplication of names and the confusion resulted in that way. I assume that my own case is not at all unique in that respect. I suppose every Member of the House has had cases of this sort, perhaps many of you more frequently than I have. I simply desire to bring this matter to the attention of the House at this time, and to express the hope that it may be possible for the War Department to modify its policy in this connection. I ask the Clerk to read in my time a very brief extract from a Lowell, Mass., newspaper on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

If the custom of not publishing the addresses of those of our boys who suffer sickness, wounds, or death in France is meeting with the same disadvantages throughout the country as has been the case in this city, surely it will not prevail for a much longer time, for through the giving out of names minus the addresses of the parties of at least three soldiers during the past 10 days similar to those of Lowell boys now fighting in the trenches needless pain and temporary sorrow have been suffered by the relatives and friends of the boys. In the first two cases the stories and photographs of the young men, who it was assumed were the parties mentioned in the casualty lists, were published in this paper, only to be retracted a day or so afterwards, when the addresses of the unfortunate young men were traced to Methuen, Mass., and Bridgeport, Conn., respectively. The last and third incident occurred only yesterday, when the casualty list as published in Boston papers contained the name of a young man who had died of disease which was identically the same as that of a young man who was taken from this city in the first draft quota. The local young man happens at this time to be confined in a hospital in the South, while his comrades are either in France or on the way over there; so that it is apparent that had his people not known definitely his present whereabouts they would have been justified in believing that it was their son and brother who had been the victim in the hospital in France.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. THOMPSON for two weeks, on account of illness.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts to preside to-morrow at the memorial services for the late Representative SULLOWAY.

COMMITTEE APPOINTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] in the place of Mr. LENROOT as a member of the special committee to consider water power.

EXPERT TRANSCRIBERS FOR THE OFFICIAL REPORTERS (H. REPT. NO. 524).

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 318.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, compensation at the rate of $1,200 per annum, payable monthly, for the employment of six expert transcribers, who shall be appointed by and be under the direction and control of the Official Reporters of Debates in the preparation of copy of the proceedings of the House of Representatives for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the necessity for a change of the method of compensation of the transcribers employed in the office of the Official Reporters of Debates has about reached its culmination. Heretofore each reporter has paid his own transcriber's salary, sometimes for nine months, sometimes longer, for the purpose of having transcribed the speeches and proceedings on the floor. The amount paid by the Official Reporters for this work has been repaid to them by the House at the end of each session by an item in the general deficiency appropriation bill. In the War Department and in other departments higher salaries are paid than the Official Reporters are able to pay for this service. In order that a person may be qualified to be an expert transcriber considerable training is necessary, and I am informed by the reporters that it takes 12 months or longer before a transcriber becomes thoroughly familiar with the terminology and phraseology of the House. The language is different, the variety of subjects discussed is very great, and for that reason an ordinary transcriber can not do the work satisfactorily.

This resolution is intended to provide six transcribers at $100 a month and put them on the annual roll. The Official Reporters can secure transcribers in that way; but when the position is a session employment, the salary being so small it is impossible to keep them. I understand that Mr. Lafferty, one of the reporters, has had his transcriber leave him to accept a position paying $200 a month, and one of the other reporters has had a similar experience.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The Committee on Accounts has made a sufficiently careful investigation of this matter to be sure that it is one of the essential things to be done now, to take care of the business of the House.

Mr. PARK. It seems so to the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I think so, too.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand this resolution, it provides that each reporter may appoint a transcriber?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The transcribers to be under the direction and control of the Official Reporters?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. At $100 a month, annually?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. To be paid out of the contingent fund until otherwise provided by law?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Under the present arrangement the reporters of the House appoint these transcribers and pay them monthly while Congress is in session, and at the end of the session through the Committee on Appropriations they are reimbursed for the money so paid by them?

Mr. PARK. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The only difference between the proposed arrangement and the present arrangement is that they will be put on the roll and carried annually at $100 a month?

Mr. PARK. Yes. Of course the gentleman knows that Congress has been in session almost continuously in recent years.

Mr. GARNER. I think this is undoubtedly the better plan.

Mr. PARK. If Congress remains in session 10 months. All department clerks are entitled to 30 days annual leave and not exceeding 30 days sick leave, so that the service is practically the same.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the gentleman, one of the principal reasons for this resolution is that the salaries paid for similar service by the War Department and other departments is causing these employees to go, because they get a salary from the reporters only while Congress is in session, and this proposes to secure their continuous employment at the same salaries that they could get somewhere else.

Mr. MADDEN. Another reason is that it will relieve the reporters of the necessity of paying this money out of their monthly salary, which is a great burden.

Mr. GARNER. And if you do not pass this resolution it will be difficult for the reporters to get efficient transcribers, because they will go somewhere else.

Mr. MADDEN. Exactly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. PARK. I will yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there is no disposition on the part of anyone in the House to compel the reporters of the House to pay out of their own pockets, as has been the practice in the past, money to pay transcribers of the proceedings of the House until reimbursed by Congress at the close of the session. Originally the reporters themselves performed this work, but for a number of years past, in order to have the copy brought to the floor as quickly as possible for the use of the Members in revision, it has been performed by transcribers, who take the reports from the phonograph and typewrite it on machines.

This bill is a forerunner of what we may expect not only for the help of the Official Reporters of the House but for similar help to those of the committees. They, too, receive $5,000 per annum, and they employ transcribers in some instances running up to $200 a month. It is an unpleasant task for me to take the position that I do, but I do not believe that we are warranted by the facts presented to the legislative committee in considering the employees of the House in putting these people on the annual roll. I have no objection to placing them on the rolls as session employees.

It is true that we have a peculiar condition existing at the present time. The War Department is very desirous of getting all the clerical help and stenographers possible. These stenographers receive an entrance salary of $1,100, payable out of a lump sum, but their positions are not permanent. These persons now employed as transcribers are simply typists. It may be that some have gone down to the department—in one or two instances the younger ones have left and taken up some gainful employment. There are only four committee stenographers on the permanent roll. They do not perform all the work of reporting, but employ stenographers in the city who receive 15 cents per folio. That character of temporary employment can be obtained any time. I believe that this character of employment can be obtained at all times and these persons now employed retained in the Government employment if given session employment. It is different, as far as these employees are concerned, from the political appointments of the House, for they are brought from far and near and the little extra compensation that they get goes for mileage.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Does the gentleman believe that anyone in these times of the high cost of living could get along on the temporary employment as suggested by the gentleman?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; they have worked for that in times past, and the same employees have remained. If $100 is not sufficient, make it more as a temporary employment. When we have short sessions you can not justify giving more than a temporary employment, as persons can be found anywhere in the District to do the work of transcribing. It is not difficult for us to find stenographers to do the work of a stenographic character. So I say that we should, as with the committee reporters, merely provide employment for the session. If $100 is not sufficient, make it $125. I am going to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he will not yield to me to offer an amendment inserting, after the word "transcribers," the words "during the sessions of Congress."

Mr. PARK. I do not want to be taken off the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course not. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman yields to me, with the understanding that I will not take the gentleman off the floor, to insert, after the word "transcribers," the words "during the sessions of Congress."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "transcribers," insert the words "during the sessions of Congress."

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman referred to these employees as merely typists. I think it is fair, and I know the gentleman wants to be fair, to say that they are more than that, they are expert typewriters and operatives of talking machines.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are typists and transcribers, that is the technical term. They are employed in the law offices where they dictate to phonographs, and then it is transcribed on the typewriter. The reporters go downstairs after they take five minutes of debate, talk into a phonograph, and then it is taken off by these transcribers. What is the effect of this amendment? It will not only give permanent status to these people, but it will give them $100 a month while they have received in times past in some instances $85 a month.

But more, they will receive the additional allowance we have provided for all employees of the Government during these stressful times. If $100 a month is not sufficient, let us pay them more, but let them be session employees. These are people who can be obtained at any time in the District, who do this character of work. They will always be available and perform it efficiently. So I say that this amendment should be adopted, not only for the reason that it is applicable in this case, but when the committee reporters come before you and ask for a similar raise, that their employees, who are temporary, should be placed on the permanent roll, we can provide for them merely for the session, or as the work requires, and not give them an annual status.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did I understand the gentleman to say that ordinary typists are competent to do this work at any time, and may be obtained down here in the city?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; it is a similar condition to stenographers to committees. We only have four stenographers to the committees, and yet at times there are a dozen stenographers employed by reason of having permanent offices in the District.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think, in fact does he not know, that there are many technical terms and expressions constantly being used by the presiding officer and by gentlemen on the floor in debate, which these people learn to take with great rapidity and transcribe on the typewriter, and that they must become familiar with this technical language in order to do efficient service?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, there have not been any changes in the personnel of this force to speak of until recently. They have been employed there for a long time. As soon as these temporary war conditions have passed there will not be any difficulty with this.

Mr. GARNER, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. WALSH rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. To no one at the present time. There would not be any need for continuing these permanently when this exigency passes over.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman know the difference in the cost per annum under this arrangement and the present arrangement?

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I suppose the difference in the cost, when we take in the committee reporters, will be several thousand dollars——

Mr. GARNER. No; I am not talking of that——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes——

Mr. GARNER. I can not see the point of the gentleman from Wisconsin to save my life, where this applies to the committee reporters because they go out, as the gentleman says, and get somebody else——

Mr. STAFFORD. I beg the gentleman's pardon, then; I have not made myself clear. I decline to yield further, because my time is running. The committee reporters, and they are four in number, have employed many from outside to help perform the same character of work. The reporters take dictation of hearings, and they have their copy transcribed, and they employ temporary help, just like the Official Reporters of Debates of the House, for that purpose. In some instances they pay as much as $200 a month to some individuals that transcribe copy. These same employees will be seeking for places on the permanent roll if you adopt this resolution. That is the point I am making.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was desiring recognition. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, as he was asking for recognition before the gentleman from Illinois, and he is protesting——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman withdraws his protest, and I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Does not the gentleman think under existing conditions, and the long session, and prompt work of this House, and good work, that the House, which will be in session when peace comes, with people who are competent and who we can get very well—does not the gentleman think that we can trust a future House of Representatives when peace comes to do the proper thing?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has been long enough in Congress to know that when once you place an employee on the permanent roll there is no change from that status.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. I am in favor of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK], because I believe it is one of the essential needs of the hour. I do not think the gentleman from Wisconsin understands the situation, though he may have been giving study to it in the committee of which he is a member in the Appropriations Committee room. The reporters have paid the transcribers out of their own pockets for 30 years, so they have not been doing the transcribing themselves in recent years.

It may be that what is said on the floor of the House is not always important, and perhaps in many cases it is not. If it is not worth preserving, of course the thing to do is to do away with the reporters.

Mr. BUTLER. To do away with the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. And if you do away with the RECORD you will of course do away with the reporters. That might possibly be a good thing to do, but we shall never do that; and if we are going to insist upon having what we say reported, written out, and handed back to us for revision in 5 or 10 minutes after it is spoken, then we ought to furnish the kind of facilities that will enable the reporters to give us what we want [applause], and you can not furnish that in a haphazard way. The gentleman from Wisconsin says it is easy to get stenographers. Yes; but what kind of stenographers? I have been trying to get them. The kind that come to you looking for a job are enough to drive a man to drink. [Laughter.] It is outrageous for them to classify themselves as stenographers. They do not know any more about stenography than a last year's bird's nest; that is, the most of them who come around looking for a job. It is difficult to get a good man or a good woman in the stenographic line to-day at any price, and these people who are required to transcribe the debates of the House are required to be experts. The reporters themselves have not the time, and they ought not to be required to do this transcribing. If this was a million-dollar proposition there would not be a word said against it; but it happens to involve only about ten or fifteen dollars, and of course we are going to take a half a day in objections to it. We never have any trouble when it comes to a billion dollars. That goes over the heads of most of the Members here. If it reaches only a million, it goes over the heads of a great many, but when it gets down to $10, of course quite a few object to it. [Laughter.] Here is a case where we hear an objection to the expenditure of a needed small sum of money to furnish information to Members, whose speeches are rewritten by the reporters in nine cases out of ten, because if they were taken down and transcribed literally and sent to the public in that form they would in many cases be a sad mess. [Laughter.]

I am glad we have a fine lot of reporters here and that they have a lot of expert transcribers, because as the manuscript comes back to us it looks like a literary gem compared with what is was when it was uttered. [Applause.] So I have some sympathy with the demands of the reporters, because they have made it possible for some gentlemen here to appear in the rôle of polished orators, when sometimes they have not uttered a sentence grammatically correct in the course of what they had to say upon the floor. They have been thought to have some literary ability, due altogether to the fact that the reporters know what words to use when Members fail to use the right words. [Applause.] Of course, there are exceptions to that rule; but there are some people here who use worse English than I do, and I think in the interest of good order and good custom and good grammar and in the interest of spreading the impression among the people to the effect that Members of Congress are really what they are not, why, we ought to pass this resolution without any further talk about it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARK].

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PARK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

NORMAN E. IVES (H. REPT. NO. 525).

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia offers the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 308.

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $1,460 to Norman E. Ives for extra and expert services to the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-fifth Congress as assistant clerk to said committee, by detail from the Bureau of Pensions, pursuant to law.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred resolution No. 308, has considered the same. This is the customary resolution for the person assigned to this committee and provides the same amount allowed in the Sixty-fourth Congress. It is ordered that the resolution be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STAFFORD. To ask the gentleman to yield for a question. Do I understand that this is the same amount that has been voted to this clerk in former Congresses?

Mr. PARK. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PARK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

WILLIAM M'KINLEY COBB (H. REPT. NO. 523).

Mr. PARK. I also present the following resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 310.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $1,200 to William McKinley Cobb for extra and expert services rendered to the Committee on Pensions during the first and second sessions of the Sixty-fifth Congress as assistant clerk to said committee by detail from the Bureau of Pensions pursuant to law.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PARK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

INCLUSION INTO MILITARY SERVICE OF CERTAIN CLASSES.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to report a disagreement between the conferees on the part of the Senate on Senate joint resolution 123, the quota resolution, for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on joint resolution 123, providing for calling into the military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Was this conference requested by the House or the Senate in the first instance?

Mr. DENT. It was requested by the Senate and agreed to by the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The House has the papers?

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman presenting this for printing under the rules?

Mr. DENT. That is all.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed under the rules.

DISARMAMENT ON THE GREAT LAKES.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, I hope that will be the only request this morning, because we are anxious to get into the mining bill and very anxious to finish it up this afternoon so that we can carry the vote over until Monday.

Mr. MOORE of Pensylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman consent to me having one minute following the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will yield one minute to the gentleman.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what subject is the gentleman going to discuss? And, more especially, I want to know what subject the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is going to discuss.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to make some reference to the necessity for hospitals to take care of our wounded soldiers.

Mr. HEFLIN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] having 10 minutes, and yielding 1 minute of that time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, 100 years ago tomorrow President James Monroe, by proclamation, published and put into effect a treaty that had been negotiated by Mr. Rush, our Secretary of State, and Mr. Bagot, the British minister to the United States, and which had been confirmed by the Senate of the United States. This treaty decreed that neither Great Britain nor the United States should maintain an armed fleet upon the Great Lakes. It attracted very little attention at the time. Events recently at hand have given it a great significance, and I think this one-hundredth anniversary is entitled to a moment's consideration. This was practically the first disarmament treaty of modern times, and the only one that has proven effective. It was not believed at the time by either party that it would be lasting over an extended period of time. It was an experiment. As a matter of fact, its very terms stated that it could be abrogated by six months' notice on the part of either side.

One hundred years have come and gone and that treaty is still in force. It is in force to-day stronger than ever before, because it is backed up by the sentiment of the entire people on each side of the line. We have come to realize that it is possible for two Christian, civilized nations to live side by side without pointing a musket at each other's breast. The boundary line between Canada and the United States, geographically, will continue always to exist, but peace, amity, concord, and good will, the one nation to the other, will last throughout all time. [Applause.]

We are now comrades in the great struggle to make this world a place wherein free men can dwell, and when the day of peace shall have come we will be comrades in the effort to preserve the peace of mankind, that the horrors of war shall be known no more, and that justice and good will may characterize the relations between the nations of the earth.

We now know that two nations that are actuated by a sense of justice, fair dealing, and good will can live in peace and harmony side by side. Canada and the United States, therefore, have set a great example to the world, and one that may serve to guide us in the years that may follow at the conclusion of this war.

I have long been one of those strongly in favor of a great military establishment for the United States. I have, in the years that I have been privileged to vote, always voted for the greatest number of battleships that could be suggested. I have voted for an increase in our Military Establishment on land at every opportunity that I have had, having in mind the fact that this world consists not entirely of nations that bear to each other good will and a sense of fair dealing. But I have still had in mind that eventually a time would come when the nations of the world would be actuated in their relations toward each other by those lofty motives that should actuate men in their daily lives as neighbors, and when that day shall have arrived the time for great fleets will have passed. The Great Lakes, in the heart of the American continent, form the greatest highway of commerce in the world. The ships of war are there seen no more, but the ships of peace, trade, and commerce move back and forth upon the broad, beautiful waters of those lakes and constitute material evidence of the fruits of peaceful industry, enjoyed by the peoples on both sides of the boundary line. The agreement that neither side should maintain armed ships on the Great Lakes has meant much to both nations. Were it not for that treaty we would have been compelled to maintain a great Navy in that quarter, one that would have cost us hundreds of millions of dollars. Its creation and maintenance would have prevented building and keeping on the ocean our present mighty fleet. Our naval strength by being concentrated on the ocean has been vastly augmented by this treaty. Russia has maintained a fleet on the Black Sea and on the ocean, and has never been a first-class sea power.

After Great Britain had completed the Suez Canal and it was opened to the commerce of the world, the world began to use it, and was amazed after half a century of its use—nearly half a century—to find that the tonnage there carried had risen to the magnificent total of about 22,000,000 tons annually.

Just before this great war broke out the commerce through the Suez Canal had increased to nearly 30,000,000 tons. The commerce through the "Soo" Canal, connecting Lake Superior with the Lower Lakes, now each year is above 90,000,000 tons, by all odds the greatest commerce to be found on any one spot in the world. At the western extremity of the Great Lakes is a city not as large in size as many on the Great Lakes, but it now has the distinction of having the greatest maritime commerce of any city in the world with the exception of one.

My good friend from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] has to-day introducing a bill recognizing the one-hundredth anniversary of the event to which I have called attention, and in that bill he proposes to erect a memorial to this long period of peace and good will that has existed between the two nations. By reason of this treaty and of this period of good will the great commerce on the Great Lakes has been possible, and while we should bend every conceivable energy in the direction of making ourselves in a military way the strongest power in the world at the earliest possible moment, let us not lose sight of the fact that nations can dwell in peace and harmony without arms and without ships of war. In general disarmament alone lies the safety of small nations. For a long time we must be prepared, but I believe we can begin to see the dawn of a better day, and this example that Canada and the United States have set—I might say that Great Britain and the United States have set—let it not fade from our conscience and our thoughts in the peace days that are to follow. [Applause.] Let it be strongly suggestive to us when this greatest war in the history of man shall have ended with the complete triumph, as I believe, of the principles of humanity, Christianity, freedom, and liberty, that the day then will have come when we can begin to break up our swords and melt our cannon and dwell together, the nations of the world, in peace, good will, and harmony. Then there will in truth be realized that millennium for which we have fought and toward which we are fighting our way—the one England's greatest poet saw when he wrote "the parliament of man and the federation of the world." [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I regret to say there is an increased demand for hospital accommodations in this country for our sick and wounded soldiers returning from the fighting fields of France. It gives me satisfaction in this connection to have read at this time the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA LODGE, No. 2, B. P. O. ELKS,
Philadelphia, Pa., April 26, 1918.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR BROTHER MOORE: At a session of Philadelphia Lodge, No. 2, B. P. O. Elks on the 23d instant, by a unanimous vote, the trustees were directed to tender to the United States Government its home, No. 1320 Arch Street, Philadelphia, for hospital use during the war and as long thereafter as it may be required.

You being a member of No. 2 are requested to make this tender on behalf of the lodge and its trustees.

Fraternally, yours,

PHILADELPHIA LODGE, No. 2, B. P. O. ELKS,
JOHN C. BREWIN,
Secretary for Trustees.

[Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, appreciating the spirit of the Philadelphia Elks, as shown in the letter of Mr. Brewin, I have transmitted this letter to the Secretary of War and to the Secretary of the Navy, asking for it their careful consideration. Philadelphia Lodge, No. 2, I believe, is the oldest lodge of the many which now make up the great body of Elkdom. It has been actively engaged during the war in patriotic and benevolent work and seeks to be of still greater service, as evidenced by this tender of its splendid headquarters for the amelioration of the condition of our sick and wounded soldiers and sailors.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks briefly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram received from the San Francisco Labor Council, answering certain comments that appeared in the RECORD recently regarding the position of that body on the Mooney case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a telegram from San Francisco about the Mooney case. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, the statements which the gentleman refers to were not contained in any proceedings of the House?

Mr. NOLAN. No.

Mr. WALSH. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JONES, OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House set aside Sunday, the 26th day of May, for addresses on the life, character, and public services of my late eminent colleague, WILLIAM A. JONES, a Representative of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to set aside Sunday, May 26, to memorialize the late Representative WILLIAM A. JONES, of Virginia. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11259, the mining bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 11259. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11259, the mining bill, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11259, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That, from time to time, whenever the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, shall find it essential to license the manufacture, storage, mining, distribution, or use of any necessaries, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after the date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of mining, manufacture, storage, distribution, or use of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement, unless he shall comply with license regulations issued pursuant to this section. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue and revoke such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance and revocation of such licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licenses, submission of reports by them with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the duly authorized agents of the Secretary of the Interior of the places of business, correspondence, papers, books, and records of licenses. Whenever the Secretary of the Interior shall find that any royalty, charge, price, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, or causing waste, and shall order such licensee within a reasonable time fixed in the order to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, wasteful, discriminatory and unfair royalty charge, price, commission, profit, or practice. The Secretary of the Interior may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, wasteful, discriminatory and unfair royalty, charge, price, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory and fair royalty, charge, price, commission, profit, or practice, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the Secretary of the Interior shall be prima facie evidence. Any person who willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, wasteful, discriminatory and unfair royalty, charge, price, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or any regulation prescribed under this section, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both, and in addition, shall pay into the United States Treasury the full amount of any excessive royalty, charge, price, commission, or profit which he may have received in violation of any such order or regulation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think all of us desire that the administration may have every power that is necessary or even convenient for the successful prosecution of the war. But this bill contains many new and some very curious propositions which do not seem to be in entire keeping with either a proper legal theory or a proper carrying out of the powers conferred in the bill. The section under consideration follows to some extent the licensing provision of the food law. I wish it followed it to a greater extent than it does; because it seems to me that in the parts in which it has been changed, this section is less workable than the license section of the Food Administration law. I call attention to the fact that the first part of this section provides that no person shall carry on the business prescribed in it unless—and this is the language to which I desire to call particular attention—unless he shall comply with the license regulations issued pursuant to this section.

Now, the language to which I have called attention does not provide that a person engaged in this business shall not carry on the business unless he obtains a license, and nowhere in this section and nowhere in the law is it made an offense to carry on a business referred to in this section without obtaining a license. The Secretary is authorized to revoke a license; but how can he revoke a license if the law does not require a person engaged in the business to have a license? It seems to me that this section is obviously defective in this particular, because it is not equivalent to requiring a license to say that he shall not carry on the business unless he shall comply with license regulations issued pursuant to this section. And this is particularly true when the section does not provide any penalty for carrying on a business without a license. The final four or five lines of this section are entirely new, and I think similar language can not be found in any Federal statute now on the books. It provides as a penalty——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman leaves the license feature I would like to ask him a question. Has the gentleman finished with that?

Mr. ANDERSON. I did not intend to discuss it any further at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It occurs to me that there might be a further discussion of the advisability of leaving open for private enterprise such operations as private operators might carry on during the war.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, under this provision, if licenses are required at all, I take it that licenses would have to be required from all of those engaged in a particular line of business. That is, a license could not be required of one man engaged in the manufacture of one of the articles specified here and not required of another man engaged in the same line of business. Licenses ought to be required of all the persons engaged in a certain line of business as a class. Otherwise this provision would obviously be without legal basis.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not say that the gentleman's criticism is not justified; but here is a bill which, if it was carried out to its full length, would probably suppress private enterprise in the matter of mining and prospecting hereafter, or at least during the period of the war. Ought we to go that far? The Government is going to be the principal purchaser of the products, no doubt. If it is, it has a hold upon any man who undertakes to do business apart from the Government, by simply refusing to buy his product.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, the gentleman's suggestion goes to the whole policy involved in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. No doubt the powers conferred in this bill, as was so well suggested by the gentleman from Indiana in the general debate, can be used, or can be abused, in such a way as to discourage rather than promote the production of the articles specified in it. But, of course, in the exercise of his powers under this license section the Secretary would only require a license, I take it, from the particular classes of business which it was necessary to license in order to effect the purposes of the act; and I suppose he would go no further than was necessary to effect those purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If this law applied to investments themselves rather than to the business resulting from investments, I take it that a license by the Government would effectually stop investments that were not licensed. The question is, Do you want to apply that policy so far as to have boycotted by the Government, through the license system, a man who undertakes to do business independent of the Government?

Mr. ANDERSON. I assume in all of this legislation that where you undertake to require a license you must require it of all the persons engaged in a certain line of business as a class, and that you can not require a license from one man engaged in a certain business and not require it of another man engaged in the same line of business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, suppose the Government does not want the mine that I am operating and does not take it under this bill. I suppose it has that option. Should I not be permitted to go on with my business whether the Government licenses me or not?

Mr. ANDERSON. Unquestionably that is so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If I have not been requisitioned, I am forced to do business on my own account and in competition with the Government. If the Government, by not giving me a license and refusing to take my goods, leaves me stranded with my property on my hands, it seems to me to go further than we intend to go.

Mr. ANDERSON. I assume that if a man comes within the class required to obtain a license under the act, complies with the regulations laid down for that class, he would have a right to a license as a matter of law; that the Secretary could not refuse a license to any person engaged in that class of business for which a license is required, if the person complied with the regulations.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the Secretary could grant a license to one mine operator and refuse it in the case of a competitor, it would be an unfortunate situation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Such an interpretation and application of this provision would be absolutely invalid.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman has taken a good deal of interest in this matter, and I would like to know, seeing it has the hall mark of war legislation, whether it comes within any recommendation, oral or written, in any message from the Executive that this is a war measure and as such is desired to be passed by this Congress.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am not a member of the committee, and I do not know what communication the committee may have had from the Executive which resulted in the reporting of this bill. I take it that it is suggested as a war measure, although I think that foundation is, as to a great many products mentioned in the bill, a very flimsy one.

Now, I want to discuss very briefly the penalty part of this section. It is provided:

Any person who willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, wasteful, discriminatory, and unfair royalty, charge, price, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or any regulation prescribed under this section, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both—

I have no objection whatever to that penalty. It says further:

and, in addition, shall pay into the United States Treasury the full amount of any excessive royalty, charge, price, commission, or profit which he may have received in violation of any such order or regulation.

In the first place, the penalty here imposed is so indefinite that it ought not to be contained in any criminal statute. What does excessive royalty mean? Does it mean the entire royalty which may be charged, or does it mean the royalty in case of a man——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have no disposition whatever, as far as I am concerned, to delay the passage of the bill. I do think that these new and absolutely novel propositions at least require some sort of explanation from the committee, and I am simply directing attention to them in order that the committee may answer the doubts which I have expressed.

Mr. FOSTER. We will do the best we can, but we have not yet had a chance.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am going to give the gentleman a chance very soon.

Mr. FOSTER. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think we will get along just as fast if we do not undertake to limit the time at this stage of the proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that we spent several days on the food-control bill, and that bill was infinitely less drastic and infinitely less comprehensive and contained powers very much less broad than this bill contains.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. I may suggest something that the gentleman may want to refer to. In regard to the penalty section, we had before the committee Mr. Hoover, who has been engaged in executing the law reported from a committee of which the gentleman is a member, and he said that the license section in the food bill was in a way a failure, because it did not contain any penalty except the right to revoke the license. He said that was entirely too drastic, except in the most unusual and exceptional cases. He said under that you could destroy everything in the shape of business that a man had built up for years. From his experience he recommended strongly a penalty section that might be used in lieu of the revocation of the license. And then he said if you had a fine the opportunity for profiteering might be so great that a fine of $5,000 would be paid without any hesitation and without any loss, as the profits might be worth $100,000. Therefore we thought that there ought to be added to it the provision that the profits he made in addition should be forfeited to the Government.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not object to the penalty at all. I think such a penalty is entirely in keeping with the offense. I do question that the committee has so drawn the penalty as to make it a legal penalty or an enforcible penalty. In the first place, of course, if the Secretary of the Interior establishes what is a legal charge for a licensee, and a licensee charges a higher price any person injured, by that very fact, would be entitled to a recovery from the licensee of the excessive charge. Does the Government have the same right? It has no property interest in the amount which has been charged in excess of the legal standard. If this is a criminal penalty I say that its language is so indefinite and the amount of the penalty so undetermined that it ought not to be in any criminal statute in the form in which it appears here. I say that it is very doubtful at best if it does not place the individual in double jeopardy, because the amount of this penalty can only be ascertained by a judicial trial by the determination of the amount in court, and that can not be had in a criminal prosecution or a criminal trial. It would have to be determined in a separate trial for that purpose. If it is a criminal penalty, of course, if the man had already been fined or imprisoned for the act it would be double jeopardy. If it is a civil penalty, which applies only for the benefit of the person from whom the illegal charge is taken, then it is not double jeopardy, because it is simply a civil action on the part of the person from whom the excessive charge has been taken to recover the amount he is entitled to recover.

I merely direct the attention of the committee to this because it seems to me that in the form in which this penalty is now worded it may entirely defeat the purpose that the committee has in putting it into the law and may prevent the enforcement of the entire statute.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Betting is made unlawful by statutes in most of the States. Does the gentleman think a penal statute which imposes a penalty of fine and imprisonment and also forfeiture of any amount won would be a double jeopardy?

Mr. ANDERSON. Forfeiture to the State?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think so, if it involves a separate trial for the purpose of ascertaining the amount.

Mr. GORDON. How would that affect the question of jeopardy? The second trial would be in the nature of a civil action brought by the State to recover the amount adjudged to be paid.

Mr. ANDERSON. In my judgment the State has no property right in that money.

Mr. GORDON. It can create one by statute.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it could, because the Constitution provides that you can not take property without compensation, and money is property.

Mr. GORDON. You can take it as a penalty.

Mr. ANDERSON. If you take it as a criminal penalty, that makes double jeopardy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the committee spent some time in discussing this section, and also had Mr. Hoover before it, who is the Food Administrator, and who has the administration of that law. He discussed it very freely. He said this is an important section. He believed in the licensing system to a certain extent, but he believed that everyone ought to be licensed by proclamation. His reason for that was that if that was made so it would save the work in his department of several hundred clerks.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Licensing by proclamation was intended to do away with the necessity of making individual applications for licenses.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly. He also said this, that merely to fine a man who was profiteering in articles necessary during the war is not a sufficient penalty. He gave an illustration of one man who was operating, as I remember, a flour mill. He said a man might be making $150,000 by profiteering, and to fine him $5,000 would not amount to anything; that he would still have $145,000 left; that he could pay the fine and go ahead and have that much profit.

Mr. ANDERSON. Put him in jail.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; put him in jail, too, if necessary. But he said one of the best things suggested in this bill was that the man should give up the illegal profit that he had made; that it should be taken away from him. I think in the administration of the food law they have instituted some sort of system by which a man does give up his profit, putting it into the Red Cross or some other organization. He said that the last thing that ought to be done in this country was to take away a man's license to do business, but if you could have a provision that would take away the profit he gets in an illegal way you would accomplish better results than by fining him or taking away his license.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. The question in my mind is whether this profit ought to be confiscated for the Government, or confiscated and taken in the name of the persons who have been injured.

Mr. FOSTER. That would be pretty hard to do, there might be so many of them; but it is a question whether it ought to be with the Government and go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. After his experience in administering the food law, it was his judgment that to take away the excess profits would be the most effective weapon there was.

Mr. ANDERSON. I quite agree with the gentleman, and I hope it may be done, but I would like to direct the gentleman's attention to the other matter to which I referred, and that is that in this section there is no provision which requires a person to have a license before doing business, that makes it unlawful to do business without a license.

Mr. FOSTER. No; and it was not intended, possibly, that it should be. The licensing system may not be used at all under this bill. If it becomes a law it is likely that they may license nobody, but the provisions of profiteering apply just the same whether a man be licensed or not. That does not make any difference. As compared with those who are licensed under the food bill, under this bill there would be but few who would be licensed.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would call attention of the gentleman right here to the fact that this does only apply to royalties and charges made by licensees. It does not apply to those made by anyone else.

Mr. FOSTER. They would license all of them if necessary. There are not so many of them, so that it would not take so much work.

Mr. ANDERSON. If there is no penalty against not having a license, men will not take a license. They will do business whether licensed or not.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I do not think it is material whether there is a license or not.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This provision which requires proclamation prior to the time a person may observe the license regulations really provides for licensing everyone engaged in that particular occupation, does it not?

Mr. FOSTER. That is also true; it amounts to the same thing; but no formal license is issued.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is not there some confusion about the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given two minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Make it five minutes.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask one or two questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is not the word "license" used with two different meanings, one that the license is an actual paper to exhibit the fact that a person is licensed to do a certain thing and the other is the general license which is a leave granted to do a particular thing?

Mr. FOSTER. I was coming to that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If there is a general proclamation, then everybody by virtue of that proclamation is a licensee, although he does not have a piece of paper.

Mr. FOSTER. That is right; that is the intention of the committee——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And the license regulation may be issued requiring each of those licensees to comply with those regulations.

Mr. FOSTER. My recollection is Mr. Hoover said this to us, that it did not matter whether a man had a piece of paper in his hand showing that he was licensed under the food bill, but when the President, as the gentleman from Indiana said, issued his proclamation, together with the license regulations, that those are the regulations that are referred to here. The mere fact of the physical possession of a piece of paper will not amount to anything, but it will be carried in that proclamation to be issued by the President; so we added that, but it is not intended to have this license so that it should be dragged out——

Mr. ANDERSON. But is it not necessary to have in the law a provision—it does not make any difference whether you have a paper license or not—but is it not necessary to provide that no person engaged in a particular business shall continue without being included in the class that is licensed?

Mr. FOSTER. He must comply with those regulations, and no person after that date shall engage in this business without that.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it does so provide.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. CANNON. I do not see any necessity for any license. Why do not you strike out all about license and give the President power by proclamation to do certain things? Does the gentleman suppose he would have to have a license? What is the purpose of lumbering up the bill and the law?

Mr. FOSTER. There is something in what my colleague says—of course there is—and what we tried and hoped was that by providing by proclamation of the President that he would set out the regulations, and that should cover all this section.

Mr. CANNON. You make certain things unlawful in the legislation, do you not?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Then the President can make regulations by proclamation. Why do you not say so and drop all the stuff out about license?

Mr. FOSTER. That might be done.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will permit, I think there would be some question about the right of the President to issue regulations to Tom, Dick, and Harry over the country without by some system of licensing bringing persons under authority given to the President to regulate these different businesses. But I can see another reason. It may become necessary to examine the books of these different concerns and require certain reports to be made by certain agencies, but I think there would be some doubt about governmental agents having the right to go into a concern that is not licensed by the Government and demand the right to examine their books and investigate their accounts, and so forth, to determine whether they are making these excessive charges.

Mr. CANNON. If you give the Government such power by license, you can give the Government such power by law.

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly; but it is just as easy to give it by license as by law or regulation, because these licenses provided here are done by proclamation and regulation, so one road seems to be as short as the other.

Mr. FOSTER. The committee was trying to get it as short as they could by providing license regulations by proclamation.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I just desire to read the words of Mr. Hoover with reference to this subject.

> Our view of simplifying the administrative part of this would be to alter that to the intent; that every man should be considered to hold a license under the presidential proclamation. We have the mechanical difficulty of having to receive applications from every man in a given trade, and to send him an actual document of license, as the act reads now; and at the present moment I think we have 750 clerks engaged in nothing but that purely mechanical, red-tape operation of exchanging documents with the trade; and there is nothing, to our mind, effective particularly about a man possessing a document saying that he is licensed. The presidential proclamation could carry that same intent and declare that they are all actually under license, and that then if they carried on business in violation of these practices or the regulations laid down under them, that his license to do business is rescinded. I am only trying there to get over the purely red-tape difficulty of mechanical operation.

We did believe, and I believe now, that it is necessary to have the right men working in that particular business. It shows a closer touch to the work that the Government is carrying on. Merely the proclamation making him a licensee puts him in that position. It is not necessary, then, to send documents to him and keep a great force of clerks for that purpose. But you have an opportunity to call him in in case of violation much better than you would have without that provision as to the licensee.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, the committee has gotten away from the whole license system in the formal way as far as it can get under this bill without you simply say that every man who does business shall be licensed by proclamation. There are probably not 50,000 producers, and all that, of these minerals.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. This paragraph authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to determine what is a reasonable price for the respective minerals designated in section 1 for which licenses are to be authorized. I wish to inquire of the gentleman what determines the reasonableness of the profit stated in this paragraph, in fixing the price?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, they take into consideration the capital the man has invested in mining, the cost to secure the metals, whatever it may be, and all that, and a reasonable profit on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes that with one mine being rich in ore, the cost of operation would be very much different than in these unproductive mines not operated to-day, which would require a much higher price in order to make them a profitable venture. And I assume that the higher price that will be needed to develop the unprofitable mines to-day, so as to furnish sufficient supply in this country to meet the whole market conditions, will be the determining factor on which the price of the commodity is to be determined?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; I would not think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. How else, then, are you going to develop these poor and unprofitable mines that are to-day not being utilized?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say this to the gentleman, that one of these mines might be so poor and difficult to operate that it would be unprofitable, and might make the product so high that you would not want it at all. Now, it does not necessarily mean that they are going to take every mine, however difficult it may be to get that ore or metal to the market. It does not mean that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take, for instance, the coal industry——

Mr. FOSTER. This does not include coal.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take the actual operation by the Government in trying to fix the price of coal. They have fixed the price based upon the cost of developing the ore from respective zones of mines. They have not fixed a general price throughout the country for a certain grade of bituminous coal, but they have taken into consideration the cost of operation. As I understand, this bill is not purposed to fix different prices for the same commodity, but to fix one universal price the country over.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, of course, the price of manganese that is produced on the Atlantic coast, where probably most of it would be consumed, might be different to what it would be in a section of the United States farther removed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Possibly the cost at the place of consumption may be different, but I am asking this question: Whether it is not purposed by this bill to have one price at the mine for the same quantity the country over?

Mr. FOSTER. Why, I think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the rule as to fixing the price on bituminous coal. The department recognized the need of fixing the price conditionally, based on the cost of production, which is dependent on the difficulty of extracting the ore from the mine. However, here you are going to run wild and fix one general price, the minimum price, to develop the quantity that is necessary for home consumption, that will be the basic price, and pay that price to the owner who has a profitable mine at a lower price.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no. The attempt would be to fix a price that would be fair and reasonable to men who are mining this.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman must recognize that the price, if it is going to be general, will apply differently to different men, unless based on the character of the ore in these respective mines.

Mr. FOSTER. The bill authorizes the fixing of these prices that will be fair and equitable and nondiscriminatory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words in order to make a brief statement. I am asked by numerous constituents to be among the first in the field in an endeavor to "cut in" for them. They seem to feel they are going to have aid in developing mineral properties. I want to read a letter. You must understand that my district is far removed from the National Capital, and the news sometimes reaches there a little late. But the news of this bill has reached the Pacific coast, and some mail is just now coming in to me about it. This is one of the first half dozen letters which I have received:

ABERDEEN, WASH., April 13, 1918.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I notice in the Oregonian that Secretary Lane has recommended to Congress a bill for the purpose of appropriating funds to encourage the development of mining prospects with a view of increasing the production of certain minerals.

Manganese was first on the list. I have a manganese prospect situated near the Olympic Highway, which I have been working on for some years and which I believe the Government would do well to investigate. Kindly give this your attention.

Thanking you, I am,
Very respectfully,
——— ———.

Now, that is one, I say, of half a dozen letters, and the news has barely reached the miners. A short time ago in considering a bill here we declined to furnish additional secretaries to Members of the House. I am satisfied that when this bill is passed—and it is sure to be passed, inasmuch as it has the proper O. K. and is put forward as a war measure—that mail of the Members from mining States will be loaded with prospects—and many of the prospects will be loaded, also.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman furnish any estimate as to the number of applicants from his district alone who will wish to have some Government aid in case this $50,000,000 wildchase project is adopted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is an interesting question. There will be many, of course. But there comes an additional problem. In my district are three gigantic forest reserves, in which large mineral areas lie. These forest reserves are not under the control of the Interior Department but are under the Agricultural Department. I wonder whether under this bill the Interior Department, desiring to secure manganese and other semiprecious minerals and metals, will go into the sacred preserves of the Agricultural Department's great reserves, the wealth of which seems to be laid aside for posterity, war or no war?

It will become a problem between these two departments just as surely as can be, or rather between two big bureaus of two big departments. I am in hopes that when a certain bill that we learn is now under consideration in another body—the executive coordination bill—is passed, as I am sure it will be, because it, too, is O. K.'d, one of the first things that the President will do in an effort to coordinate the affairs of this Government will be to yank the forestry business out of the Department of Agriculture and put it into the Interior Department along with the public lands, where it belongs.

I expect to renew from time to time the presentation of these requests for mineral investigations and experiments. I shall put in the RECORD the following reply of the Director of the Bureau of Mines in reply to the first mining letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF MINES,
Washington, April 25, 1918.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. JOHNSON: In reply to your letter of April 20 to the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter concerning a manganese property near the Olympic Highway, which he would like to have the Government investigate:

So far as is known to the Bureau of Mines, no branch of the Government at the present time is extending financial assistance toward mining ores or metals or developing mineral properties.

As you doubtless know, a bill known as the minerals administration bill, H. R. 11259, has been introduced into Congress. This bill is intended to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution of ores, metals, minerals, and their by-products, which are needed in war work and which are now largely imported. By developing the domestic supplies of such substances, it is desired to release shipping to carry supplies and munitions for the Army. Manganese is one of the metals which will be affected by the provisions of this bill.

The Bureau of Mines is very much interested in this proposed legislation, as it is the belief of the bureau that the minerals administration bill, if enacted into a law, will be of great benefit to the country. Therefore I shall take pleasure in referring your request to that department as soon as it is organized, should the bill become a law.

The Bureau of Mines has a mining experiment station located at Seattle, and I am referring your request to the superintendent of that station, with the request to communicate direct with your correspondent regarding his property.

Mr. Newbury's letter is herewith returned.

Very truly, yours,

VAN. H. MANNING, Director.

Gentlemen will note that we are going to have a bureau of minerals administration. Just another bureau, that is all, with $50,000,000 for a starter. It is put forward as a war emergency, but it will be more bureau than war emergency, as we will all find out.

Further, Mr. Chairman, when these bills come down to Congress from the department with the O. K. of the department on them, and some of them with the O. K. of the President on them, I do not see why we do not propose a better plan. Instead of certain Members having in their pockets personal letters signed by the Secretaries of different departments, Cabinet officers, or by the President, to be produced and read on the floor of the House at the psychological moment in order to press the bill over, would it not be better for the bill to have printed on its very first page the legend, "Approved by the President of the United States," or "O. K'd by the Secretary of the Interior," and then "Reported out by the chairman of such and such a committee," and thus save us all this labor and detailed discussion?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The question has been raised here time and time again, and no one has answered whether the President is for this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think he is; and if he is, it should be shown on the first page instead of waiting until it is passed by both Houses and then showing it on the last page. Let the "Approved by the President" come right along with the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not been able to find anybody who will tell us that the President is for this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did not the Secretary of the Interior say so?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, every department in this Government is striving for more power and more money. This bill involves a $50,000,000 appropriation. I will venture the assertion that the real proponents of this bill are sitting in the gallery at this moment and that they come from the Bureau of Mines. Oh, I will vote for the bill, but I hope to see it trimmed, and I advise the holders of all kinds of dead mining stocks held by people throughout the East to make haste and dig them up from their trunks and garrets and hang onto them, because if, after having tried to develop these interests, we find them taken over or developed under Federal control and a revolving fund provided, the stock therefore may be galvanized into some value.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think these stocks will go up to par?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; from 20 points below nothing to par is too much to expect even under this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think this is a stock-jobbing provision?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, more jobs in a bureau, perhaps. I suggest that little cabins be built out in that country for innumerable governmental prospectors, so that they may be housed comfortably while pursuing their work. Also nice Government houses here in Washington for gentlemen who may be called here to help inflate the Bureau of Mines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat surprised to hear gentlemen on this floor speak as they have in the last few minutes. The Shipping Board, as has been stated here, has been removing from certain foreign countries shipping that has heretofore been carrying these important minerals to this country in order that these ships may be used in the more necessary work of carrying troops and supplies to France, where they are so sorely needed. And yet men stand here on this floor—I hope they are simply trying to be humorous, and nothing else—and advocate the keeping of these ships in the foreign service, amounting to more than 400,000 dead-weight tons a year, instead of sending them where we may help to win this war, and we should develop these minerals in our own country, whether it is in the State of Washington, Oregon, California, or any other place.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I can not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been stated here—in a humorous way, I hope—that it is a question whether the President or the Secretary of the Interior may have endorsed this bill. I take it that men who have to look after securing these necessary articles for war purposes ought to have some concern and notify Congress of their opinion as to legislation that will help to secure these necessary minerals for war purposes. It is asserted here that we are to squander $50,000,000. If there is a proper administration of this money there will not be squandered one cent of the $50,000,000, but that money will be turned back into the Treasury from whence it came. This is a revolving fund, to buy these necessary articles, and then when the Government sells them the money will be returned to the Treasury of the United States, so that not one dollar need be squandered in carrying out this great work.

We find to-day that it is estimated that more than 10,000,000 tons of nitric acid are necessary for the coming year. We know that they have taken off the ships and there will be after July not more than 10,000 tons of pyrites each month brought to this country, when formerly 1,200,000 tons have been brought in each year, and the amount will be cut down now from month to month and continued at 10,000 tons.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have no more interest in this war than any other Member or any other American citizen—and I know we are all interested with all our souls—but I have every reason to believe that when this bill is fully understood you will stand with those officials who are endeavoring to secure these necessary minerals in our own country. If the time should come when we should be unable to secure these necessaries our war operations must be very much curtailed, and it would be much regretted and would be very unfortunate for us. Everyone knows that munitions can not be made without sulphuric acid. Everyone knows that steel can not be made without manganese, and other articles that are enumerated here are essential. Some of these are used for the purpose of preparing gas shells that go to France.

Are you willing, my friends, to say now that the Government shall be deprived of these materials that make these necessary articles for the war? Are you willing to stand here in this humorous way and discuss this matter lightly when these men have stated to us, through hearings before our committee, that it is necessary that we should have these necessaries for making munitions of war? I have no more interest, I repeat, than you or any other loyal American citizen in this matter, but I appeal to you because men have talked with me in the last few days who have charge of this matter and have urged the vital necessity of this legislation and asked that it be speedily passed.

Are you willing to get up here and say that this is to open up some worthless mines and make the stock of those mines worth more money; that this is to make valuable some worthless stock and bring it up to par? Are you willing to trifle with these necessary articles that enter into the production of the shells that go to the boys across the seas? If you are, defeat this bill, and in six months' time we may be in a position where we will not have these articles to carry on the war.

I warn you that that may be the situation if you defeat this bill. These boys in France depend upon us to send to them the supplies which they need. I am determined to do all I can to see they have everything necessary to efficiently equip them. We have taken the shipping, and rightfully so, carrying these necessary minerals from foreign countries—taken the ships off that work and put them to work in carrying supplies to support the gallant soldier boys across the seas.

My friends, are you going to say now that you will take back those ships, take them from the work of carrying troops and supplies to France, and put them on the route between Spain and the United States to carry pyrites, and between Brazil and the United States to carry manganese, when these minerals can be developed in our own country in sufficient quantities if only some organization is provided and some help is given? My friends, are you going to do this? If you are, then go ahead and defeat this bill. But if you are not, let us pass this bill and give the Government the right to secure these necessary minerals that they need for war purposes. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended in order that he may answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The question has been raised a number of times on the floor as to whether or not the President approves of this bill. I find on page 11 of the hearings a statement by Secretary Lane in response to a question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON]:

> Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary I presume has prepared this bill.
> Secretary LANE. Yes; it was prepared in my office. I do not know its details. I have looked it over and given my general approval of it, and so has the President.

I should like to ask the gentleman if he knows when the President did signify his approval?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether I have authority to state that; but I do know, and I say this to the House, because I think the Members out to know, in view of that statement of Secretary Lane——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Inasmuch as the quesion has been raised?

Mr. FOSTER. My understanding from Secretary Lane was that the President read this bill, and the Secretary states there that he gave it his approval, believing that it is urgent and necessary. The Committee on Mines and Mining took more interest in this than you have because it was referred to it, but in the end we have no more interest than you and other good American citizens. We did not initiate this legislation. It came to us through the regular channels, from those who have the business of hunting up and seeing to it that the Government is supplied with the materials necessary to carry on the work of the war. I know what Secretary Lane has said there is correct. Now, that is the fact, gentlemen, and as I say, the Committee on Mines and Mining have no more interest in this bill than you have. They have just as much interest. The Committee on Mines and Mining is anxious to do what is for the best interest of the country, as I know you all are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think it is unfair for Members of this House, who ordinarily would not vote for a bill of this kind, and who know they ought not to vote for it unless it is a war measure pure and simple, to inquire whether or not it has the indorsement of the President of the United States, in whom we are placing our trust?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has not answered that question. He did not answer the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. The gentleman from Ohio asked him the plain, blunt question whether the President of the United States approved this bill, and the gentleman from Illinois has not answered directly.

Mr. FOSTER. Secretary Lane says that he has approved it. That is good enough word for me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me we ought to back the President. If we had a suspicion that gentlemen working under the President, who can not give personal attention to all these matters, were springing a scheme upon the Congress of the United States to take out of the Treasury $50,000,000 or any other sum, it would be entirely proper for us to ask that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for just two minutes more, and then I shall be through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to say this, that this morning I went down to the office of Secretary Lane to talk to him in reference to the $50,000,000, and he said to me, "Why, you can say to the House that if this is properly managed there will not be one dollar but what will be returned to the Treasury. If it is left to me, I will do my best to see it is done. It is not the intention to squander $50,000,000, or to spend it except in this revolving fund." So he wrote a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, calling his attention to it. The Speaker suggested that I read it to the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is not the letter that was in the RECORD this morning?

Mr. FOSTER. No. This letter reads as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 27, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The Foster bill, which is now before you, seems to me one that should receive the support of those who wish to see this country made as self-sufficient as possible at this time. Why should we use ships to bring minerals to America which are to be found here but which have not been developed because of the cheapness with which they heretofore have been produced in distant countries? This is the insistent question which seems to me to fully justify this measure. And no one knows what dangers we may run as to our supplies being cut off! This seems to me a wise measure, it may be a vital measure, and I hope for its early passage.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That brings it back to the point where we started. The Secretary is arguing this case. The Secretary is arguing the question of ships, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] argued very eloquently himself a few moments ago. Now, I want to ask him if these ships that appear to be carrying ore here do not carry back supplies to the troops on the other side?

Mr. FOSTER. They do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do these ships go back empty?

Mr. FOSTER. They do not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If they do, it would seem to be a reflection on somebody in the shipping business.

Mr. FOSTER. They do not. In order to get this pyrites these ships must carry back a certain amount of coal. They carry this coal back and get the pyrites. We do the same thing with Brazil, so that they do not go back empty. We are keeping on just as few ships as it is possible to get along with between Spain and these other countries.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary having argued this question in this letter to the Speaker, which the gentleman has just read, and it being admitted in that letter substantially, that this is an experiment, something looking to the future, would it not be fair for the Secretary to take less than $50,000,000 with which to experiment? And if he did so, could he not come back here at any time when an emergency arises, and have the support of Congress if it was found to be necessary?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let the gentleman answer that question. Why should he not take a less amount to introduce this experiment and come back again if it is necessary?

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps that is true, but this money is not spent; it is a revolving fund. I am not saying it would not be best to do that, but it will take a good deal of money, and it will ultimately all go back into the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, after the word "order," insert the words "and findings," and in line 11, page 8, after the word "evidence," insert the words "of the facts stated therein."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed will make the language read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, wasteful, discriminatory and unfair royalty, charge, price, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory and fair royalty, charge, price, commission, profit, or practice, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order and findings of the Secretary of the Interior shall be prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein.

You will notice in the first part of the section you permit the Secretary to make an order declaring any price or practice as being unfair and discriminatory, and in the next part you authorize him to make a finding as to what shall be a fair and reasonable price. Without the amendment the sentence would be senseless. We had the same thing in the food act, and attention was called to it, but it was not corrected in committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is a matter of great consequence in the consideration of this bill from my point of view. If we are short of minerals for the United States to manufacture ammunition, would not the President under general powers conferred on him have a right to commandeer the property controlling the minerals or other products essential to the continuation of the war without this legislation?

Mr. WINGO. I do not think my amendment will change that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; but I would like to have the gentleman answer my question, if he will.

Mr. WINGO. I am discussing the amendment to the phraseology.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose the Hecla mine was needed for war purposes, would not the President have the power to take it over?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman knows the President's power as well as I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It raises the question of giving additional powers by the passage of this bill.

Mr. WINGO. Assuming that the President has all the power and could send an army out here and take charge of a mine, whether it be a civilian army or a military army, send the Government agents to dig up and get manganese and these other minerals out of the ground, stripping it of all verbiage, your proposition would mean that this Government should go into the mining business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we know where the minerals are——

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has asked a question, now I hope he will let me answer it. The gentleman asked if the President has not the power, and we will assume that he has, how is he going to exercise it? He has got to go and commandeer it and appoint men who have charge of the plant as his agents. That would be true with an established industry, that would be true if we wanted to take over a coal mine or a metal mine fully developed. That would be a different proposition from a practical standpoint. I do not think the gentleman or anyone else wants this Government to go out prospecting and digging up manganese and other mineral deposits.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we want manganese the Government should take it.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman be kind enough to allow me to answer his question. This is the second time he has interrupted me just as I got to the point where I was answering him. I know the gentleman does not intend to be discourteous; but to go over it again, I do not think the gentleman caught what I had in my mind. If the President should exercise this power he has got to use the War Department agency, go out and take an undeveloped or a not fully developed deposit, and you would have the War Department going into the mining business. I agree with the gentleman that as a last resort I would be willing to do it. But I believe the more orderly and the more practical way, and certainly from the viewpoint of our form of Government it occurs to me that the best thing to do is to allow private capital to do it, and if they need any incentive let us give them the incentive and keep the Government out of the business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. That is the viewpoint. I think I agree with the gentleman that possibly the President may have the power, but there is a dispute as to what authority he has with reference to these things. I think this much, if you do not pass legislation the President will be compelled to use some of that power, and I think he will do what he has done in the coal business and other business—create an agency which I do not want to see created. To be frank, I think we made a mistake when we took over the coal business and did not place it under the Bureau of Mines. We would have made fewer mistakes and had a more efficient administration of it. I think if you do take it over it ought to be kept with the one branch of the Government having the technical knowledge, and which is efficient and prepared to do it with the least expense, without having another expensive bureau created.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I assume the gentleman means by that that he would have been glad if the price fixing had been left to the Secretary of the Interior rather than to the gentleman now in control?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I will be perfectly frank with the gentleman. I am utterly disgusted with the way the coal situation was handled, and I do not believe it would have been handled in that way if Mr. Manning, the Director of the Bureau of Mines, and his efficient force, that has every coal mine in the United States located, had been in charge. Some of the things that we have complained of I do not believe would have happened—not that Dr. Garfield has not done the best he knew how; but take any man—you have to get cerjain things by experience, and you can not get them in any other way.

One reason why I am standing by this bill is that it will confine our operations with reference to getting these minerals that we need for war purposes to a bureau that is already established, and not build up another bureau with a lot of expensive employees. That is one reason I am for it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Not now. That has appealed to me as a practical proposition. I have stated two or three times that I do not like this kind of legislation, but I have agreed to it because of the emergency that confronts us, and I do not have to ask the President whether or not the situation that confronts us is an emergency. I think if any man will read the hearings—and those do not disclose all of the information that came to the committee and all of the discussions; I think if any man will read the statistical statement that I put into the RECORD the other day, I think if any man will take the map that is in last week's issue of the Literary Digest, showing our shipping wasted in handling these minerals, he will not need any suggestion from the President of the United States or anyone else that this is a war emergency that confronts us that has to be met in a practical manner. We must meet it as practical men. I for one am getting tired of "passing the buck" to the President. It is not fair to make him bear every load. I think the American Congress has the intelligence, and it ought to have the courage, to meet the war situations that arise without unloading on the President. [Applause.] I have not the slightest doubt in my mind that the President knows of this emergency and that he favors this kind of legislation, because he keeps up with all our war needs. It is not fair to make him, in addition to the load he has to carry as head of the executive department, also bear the load that we as legislators should bear ourselves. Every time we get a measure here that some Members do not like, they shy off like a mule with a blind bridle and somebody says, "You have got to have the President assume the responsibility or I will not vote for it." I decline to be put in that attitude. Other gentlemen can assume that attitude if they desire, and I say this without any criticism of them. I for myself am going to assume my own responsibility, and when the time comes that I have not intelligence enough to appreciate a practical war emergency that confronts my country or, having the intelligence to comprehend it and not having the courage to meet the emergency without hiding behind the President and unloading the burden on him, then I shall go out and let somebody else take my place.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I listened with great interest to the gentleman's powerful argument against the passage of the Overman bill, and I would like to ask him what his attitude is on that?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I did not make any argument against the Overman bill. I was not making an argument. I was trying to show you the reasons why I was willing to support this bill and bear my part of the burden without calling up the President and asking him to assume the whole burden.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. While we have been discussing this the question has come up about the Government going into the operation of these mines. In the gentleman's opinion, has not the mineral situation reached the point where we must choose one or two alternatives? Either the Government shall have to take charge and go into the business or we must adopt legislation of this character.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly; that is the point I tried to make three different times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I object. There is a motion before the committee, and I would like to vote upon it.

Mr. WINGO. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not care. The gentleman made a speech and asked the members of the committee to give him information. I have no desire to talk, but in behalf of the committee was trying to answer questions. I am glad that there is one gentleman, at least, who has sufficient information to vote.

Mr. ELSTON. I do not believe that the gentleman has devoted the last five minutes to an argument about the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Possibly not. The gentleman can not comprehend an argument if he hears it, and all of my remarks were prompted by questions of his colleagues.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. It is rather noticeable, Mr. Chairman, I think that as long as the members of the Committee of the Whole stand up here and recite pieces or read telegrams or discuss commissioned officers wearing uniforms, and various and sundry other matters that have nothing to do with this bill, the committee sits complacently by and are willing to have the discussion go on. However, the moment any gentleman gets us and seeks to criticize the bill or question the wisdom of its provisions the distinguished chairman of the committee rises and with great emphasis seeks to convey the impression that you are doing that which might give aid and comfort to the enemy. This is a measure that deserves most careful consideration, and merely because the distinguished Secretary of the Interior and an army of witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Mines and Mining say that this is the only way to control the situation is no reason why we should decline to consider the matter and discuss it and listen to debate. Every man, with possibly one or two exceptions, who appeared before that committee was biased, some because they were going to have the administration of the law or have written the measure, others because they are interested in the mining business and will to a certain extent benefit by this legislation. In my view, I believe there exists already sufficient authority under the national defense act for the President to place orders for these minerals and for him to see that those orders are filled, and if the orders are not filled because the people with whom they are placed are not financially able to do it, I submit that under the War Finance Corporation law, which we passed through this House some weeks ago, that such financial assistance can be rendered and that it is not necessary to build up here a great twin-sister organization to the food and fuel control body that has been created.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. FESS. Can the gentleman inform us what progress the War Finance Corporation is making in the purposes for which it was created?

Mr. WALSH. I am not advised as to that, but it is a measure which has been passed through the House and which we were given to understand was to assist corporations, individuals, and firms in conducting business which was essential to our active and successful participation in the war, and that is all this measure seeks to do. It seeks to stimulate the production of those things which we need in furthering our war program.

Mr. FESS. And the country was impressed with the fact that the measure was imminent and ought to be passed immediately?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no delay; there could not be any delay brooked.

Mr. FESS. My query is, whether there has been anything done even in the appointment of the commissioners?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Their names have not been suggested yet.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know as to that.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will read the testimony of Secretary Lane he will find that it is not intended by this bill to render aid to prospectors. They are to go to the war-finance board. We only say to them that in case they produce so much manganese and so much other things, we will give them a price.

Mr. WALSH. Fix or guarantee the price the same as was done with wheat, and they will be in here probably from that section of the country—that is, gentlemen who are most vitally interested in this measure will be in here before the life of this Congress expires asking of us legislation to increase the price over the price that is fixed per ounce of those minerals or per ton under this act, to increase it as we were asked the other day to increase the price of wheat from $2.20 to $2.50 per bushel; to legislate to fix prices above that which had been fixed. Now, I believe the members of the committee ought to be willing to have this matter discussed and to listen to suggestions, and if perhaps some gentleman in making suggestions might inject a little humor into the situation, that that might be permitted without members of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union being accused of trying to stop war preparations or trying to put obstacles in their path.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we can not reach some agreement about closing debate on this question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to have five.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to have five.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I would like to have five.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. KINKAID. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. On this section and all amendments thereto?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would like to have five on an additional amendment, on the one which I suggested to the gentleman a while ago.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a good deal of time—45 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will cut myself to two minutes.

Mr. KINKAID. I will cut myself to two minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 50 minutes.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman state who takes the time?

Mr. FOSTER. I will make it 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be limited to 30 minutes, the time to be divided as follows. Now let the Chair see if he has the list correctly. Mr. HAMLIN, 6 minutes; Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois, 5 minutes; Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, 5 minutes; Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, 2 minutes; Mr. TOWNER, 5 minutes; Mr. NOLAN, 5 minutes; Mr. KINKAID, 2 minutes; Mr. SANDERS of Indiana, 5 minutes. Is that the list?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. I waive my time for the present.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentlemen be recognized in that order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The tabulation of the time makes 27 minutes. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall terminate at the expiration of 27 minutes, the time to be divided among the gentlemen whose names have been read from the desk. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important section, and this information ought not to fall upon a few ears, and I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count.

Mr. CANNON. If this is to be considered at all there ought to be some Members here to hear it.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). Eighty gentlemen are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, that 266 Members had answered to their names, and that he presented therewith the names of the absentees for printing in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will have to amend his request for unanimous consent. There are a number of gentlemen included in the request, and the time given me makes 33 minutes instead of 27 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close at the end of 33 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I greatly appreciate the statement so seriously made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]. I may have been a bit satirical, but I can not believe that in looking into this bill and predicting a bad future for it in its operation I am endeavoring to delay any activity necessary for the war. If I neglected to say in my remarks a few minutes ago, which is the only time I have taken on this bill which is of much importance to my State, anything of its war features, I say now that I intend to vote for it. I hope, however, that the sum of money appropriated in this bill will be greatly reduced. I hope the bill will be trimmed all around. I am inclined to think that it, like some others, has as a base just as much a desire in it for bureaucratic extension as it has as a war emergency.

As to the indorsements from the White House in regard to certain bills, I notice the last presidential indorsement we had was in the form of a letter written to some Member of the House and read here, calling attention to the fact that a certain bill was a "genuine" war measure; and a letter before that one called attention to the fact that a certain other bill was a "real" war measure. We have not had a letter stating what kind of a war measure this is—real, genuine, or ordinary. We have the statement of the gentleman that this is necessary and ought to be passed. I think that all that is needed to be done could be done under the power heretofore given to the President. I think, with these maps, and so forth, printed, showing manganese and other products in nearly all States that might be increased in production, that a great amount of the production will come up behind the war necessity; and if the revolving fund stays in we will not hear the end of this thing for years and years and years. The scheme will be continued by some means. The propaganda put out to create interest in this bill has been misleading. Owners of prospects think they are going to get what they are not going to get. The big fellows will beat them to it.

I take position with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER]. I feel that I am no more to blame or responsible for this bill than he is. He could not help himself. He is doing the best he can. It is put up to him by a bureau. We can not check it, correct it, or reduce it, because it is an officially O. K.'d war measure. He feels it his duty to press it before the House, and I presume, just as on other bills at which we choked, we will all fall in the same box and will vote for it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen in charge of this bill have pleaded very earnestly for its passage, but thus far they have not clearly made known who is behind it. Up to date no one on the committee, including the chairman thereof, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], has indicated positively that the President himself has said that this is a measure that ought to be passed as a war measure.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. May I say this to the gentleman—and I will yield to the gentleman one more minute out of the six minutes reserved for this side—that a few minutes ago the gentleman asked whether the President approved of this bill? I say that the President does approve this bill. He called me to the telephone a little while ago, just after I had finished some remarks. The President told me that this bill had his full indorsement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The President of the United States said he favored it?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. The President of the United States said that this was a war measure and he regarded it very essential that it should become a law. He said it was necessary because ships had to be taken off from importing these materials to carry supplies to France. That ought to be done in order to carry on this war. This was a war measure and nothing else, and he authorized me to say to this House that the bill had his indorsement and he would be pleased to see it become a law at as early a date as possible.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, have I five minutes remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had five minutes and then he had one additional minute, given by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It took a long time for us to obtain this statement from the chairman of the committee. I am glad he has seen the importance of bringing to the House authentic information on this very important point. In the eloquent speech he made a while ago he several times observed that the bill had the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. That far he went, but no further did he go. Now, he has been called to the telephone, to be told by the President in person, that the President approves of this bill as a war measure, and that, of course, will relieve the anxiety of a number of gentlemen. But the gentleman from Illinois, as well as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], suggested that perhaps we were going too far in asking that the President should give his approval to a measure of this kind. Going too far when we, upon both sides of this House, have voted unlimited support to the President of the United States to carry forward this war, including the right to commandeer property and put it to war use? Going too far when no one would take the floor and say that the President backed this bill, when it appears on the face of it that it might mean the disorganization of the mining business of the United States? Going too far when it meant the creation of a new institution here, with $50,000,000 of the people's money at the service of new agents, to destroy private business if need be? Going too far to ask the President, in whom we place our confidence, to at least let us know if he knows about this bill?

I do not think it is unreasonable when we are asked to take $50,000,000 today, and $50,000,000 to-morrow, and $50,000,000 next day for purposes we would not dream of supporting in ordinary times. I do not think it is too much to ask the President's attitude on important or hazardous measures that people under the President, without his knowledge, might impose upon Congress for the furtherance of their own ends.

I do not think it is too much to ask that the President should confide in this body and say—through the chairman of the committee bringing forward an important bill like this—"Yes; this is a war measure. As Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States I deem it important that such a measure should be passed by Congress." That is not unreasonable when we are trying to work with the President.

For one, I want to vote for these extraordinary measures, if I have to, with the understanding that I am voting side by side with the Commander in Chief. I do not want to deceive the people of the United States, who are already overburdened with taxes. I do not want to permit monopolies or speculators to control this body. I do not want Herbert Hoover or Mr. Baruch, or any other individual who may come in here and take charge of a bureau, to tell this Congress what to do in this war emergency without the approval of the President. I want to know whether the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States requires this money of the people as a war measure. When he does that, I may be satisfied to vote for it; but I do not care to take it from understrappers. It is too serious and important a matter. The people of the United States have got to pay this bill and for such errors and mistakes as may be made. If there is disorganization of the mining business in consequence of anything that may work a monopoly in this instance, then let the responsibility be shared by the President of the United States, as well as by the Congress thereof. That is a fair proposition when the administration knows so much about the necessity for this measure, and Congress knows so little.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised indeed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] should have failed to recognize some of the propositions involved in this bill, that should, I am quite sure, appeal to him perhaps more than to any other gentleman on the floor of this House, because the gentleman ought to recognize that this bill is not only a bill for the purpose of commandeering property, if necessary, but it is also a bill for the protection of home industries by large bounties and by tariffs, if necessary. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the statement made by the Secretary of Commerce, which is extraordinarily good Republican protective doctrine. He says:

> We know approximately what we have. We simply want to be able to say to the small man and to the large man, "Gentlemen, go further in and find out what you have. Bring it out and we will see that you are not ruined."

And then the Secretary says:

> I think that is good Americanism; I think that is common sense—

And I am quite sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania will agree with that proposition—

> I know we are criticized—

He says—

> if we do not do it in the future.

So that this protective doctrine, of the protection of American industry, is not only for the present. It is also going to be pursued in the future. And then I want to quote a statement further from that distinguished Democrat—I presume, or at least, he is acting under Democratic authority and speaking under Democratic authority—Mr. Baruch. He says:

> I believe in the end that we won't pay any more for the articles mentioned here by our advancing the money and producing them in this country, and we will also have built around us a wall that will defend us in the future, and which may have to defend us in the present.

[Applause.]

Why, gentlemen on this side of the House, I have heard gentlemen on the other side of the House cry out against the Republican doctrine of building a wall for the protection of American industries. And yet my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is finding fault with a bill which is thus sponsored, and which has the special indorsement now, we are told, of the President of the United States himself.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Very gladly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, I have not deviated from my belief in the principle of protection, but I did not observe that the ordinary protective methods were being followed in this bill. Under the Republican system we used to tax the foreigner who sent his goods into this country.

Mr. TOWNER. Well, while the gentleman may not have deviated from the principle of protection, the criticism I make upon him is that he has not properly appreciated the indorsement given in this bill by the Democratic Party and the leaders on the Democratic side to the principle of the protection of American industry [applause] of the necessity; in fact, if we would in this country properly protect and prepare ourselves for war, of seeing that the industries of this country are properly protected. Why, listen to what the committee itself states in the closing paragraph of its report:

> We should be as near independent of the world as possible in war time, and it is believed that under this bill we can secure the most of these necessities.

Ah, gentlemen, we have here the statement that we ought to protect ourselves and prepare ourselves to be independent in war time, and these other gentlemen have said that that also means preparation for peace time; so that we have this indorsement, given in this extraordinarily emphatic statement of the Democratic administration itself, of the doctrine of the necessity of protecting American industry. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to address myself to the pending question, whatever it is, really to make some observations on the remarks of the last two gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair was that the time was apportioned in the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman from Texas will find out what the pending question is before he discourses upon it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Apparently I can not get any time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No Democrat explained that the principle of protection was involved here.

Mr. KITCHIN. But is it wise to let two Republicans discuss the tariff question and fight it out, and inject it into the consideration of this pending war measure?

Mr. HARDY. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] who said that he wanted to do whatever the President said he must do, and who has heretofore been so frequently delighted to charge us with yielding to the President, with being rubber stamps, and having no judgments of our own.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] is entitled to recognition for five minutes if he desires it.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman from New York will take his time on the next section.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman use half a minute of his time to allow us to get an answer to a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] is entitled to five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow a question in his time?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] savored somewhat of politics, which I have carefully avoided. [Laughter.] In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether any member of the committee, on the other side in particular, gave the House any information whatever about the protective features of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Protection in time of war.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that we have gentlemen upon the floor of the House who can not approach the consideration of any subject without an allusion to the tariff or some other phase of party politics. Now, I regard this as a very serious situation. I have stated already upon this floor that this is legislation of a character that under ordinary circumstances I would not favor for one moment, and I am sincere in that. Yet, under present conditions, as I understand them to exist, I am most heartily in favor of this legislation.

I want to impress this on the minds of every Member present. We are not seeking to help any individual or any particular business, fundamentally or primarily. We are seeking to help the American people as a whole in this terrible crisis in which we now find ourselves. We are as much a part of the Army that is fighting in France to-day as the boys on the front; they form the first line and we the reserve line. If we do not back them up in every possible way by sending them the things that they need in prosecuting this war, we are just as guilty of dodging our duty and of being called slackers as a man that will attempt to dodge his duty on the front. [Applause.]

Now, we are told by men who are presumed to know—and I must assume that they do know—that the materials provided for in this bill are vitally necessary in order to furnish the things which the country needs in prosecuting the war.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not time enough to yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I simply wanted to ask. Does the gentleman, who is familiar with the mining situation in our section of the country, have any fear that some bureau of the Government will demoralize conditions there as it has the coal-mining industry?

Mr. HAMLIN. Absolutely not; I have no fear at all, because I believe that the men who will administer this law will be men of experience to start with.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Fine!

Mr. HAMLIN. The committee was careful to provide that the administration of this law should be through the Interior Department.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the other bill had been under the Interior Department or the Bureau of Mines, we might not have the demoralized condition that we now have in the coal industry.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will say to the gentleman that there can be no question of politics in this proposition. I hope, and I speak earnestly and seriously, that gentlemen will not seek to inject any kind of partisanship into the consideration of this bill.

This situation stares us in the face, either it is necessary to control the things mentioned in this bill for the prosecution of this war or it is not necessary. That is all there is to it. If it is necessary I must assume, and I think most of us will assume, that the men who appeared before the committee, not interested as some gentleman said to-day, personally—men like the geologists of the State of Illinois, the State of Missouri, and the State of Wisconsin, whom I asked if they were pecuniarily interested in the mining industry and they said not at all, mining engineers who said they were not interested financially in mining, national organizations of the miners' associations, the Bureau of Mines, the Geological Survey, all of these men, high-class men, patriotic men, said they had no interest in this matter personally, except as patriotic American citizens. They said that the things mentioned in this bill are absolutely necessary in the manufacture of steel guns and ammunition, and so forth, and while we had them in this country we only produced on an average 25 per cent of our consumption. They said that we need ships to carry supplies to the boys in France who are fighting this war, and we could not have them if we used them in the transportation of these minerals from other countries. We need this bill to stimulate production at home at this time. I say that we need the bill and we ought to get down to business and pass it without further delay. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, by the unanimous-consent agreement I was to have five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. That was the understanding, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am not so particular about the time, but I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not have that noted on his minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] have five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us have a vote on the amendment pending before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. CANNON. Let us have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, after the word "order," insert the words "and findings." In line 11, the same page, after the word "evidence," insert the words "of the facts stated therein."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 18, after the word "business," strike out the words "correspondence, papers, books, and records."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the words I seek to have stricken out do not appear in the section of the food bill from which this section is almost an exact copy. I think it grants power and authority to agents which ought not to have been granted. There is no apparent necessity for the general power to examine the correspondence, papers, and books of the licensees. They have ample authority in former parts of the section to find out all about the accounts and get data concerning accounts, and of getting sworn statements in reference to the accounts. I think this permission to go into the correspondence, books, papers, and records is a power that ought not to be given in this section.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that if he take out the language which his amendment would remove from the bill and leave that remaining it would read, beginning on line 18, "the Secretary of the Interior of the places of business and records of licenses."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That should be "licensees."

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is a mistake in the bill, is it not?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Then that ought to be corrected.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include in my amendment the correction of the spelling of the word "licensees."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does not the gentleman think this provision ought to remain in the bill? In other words, that it would do no harm to have it remain in the bill? Can he not conceive that a condition might arise whereby it would be vitally necessary for the Government to have the right to examine the books, records, correspondence, and so forth, of some of these concerns to ascertain whether they have made or are making correct returns of their business transactions?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Government has the right to require a verified statement of these facts; and then if the licensee who made that verified statement committed perjury, the Government would have the usual procedure in cases of perjury. I think this is an unusual and extraordinary power, especially in view of the fact that it is granted not only to the Secretary of the Interior, but to any of his agents, and it might be delegated to some person that the Secretary of the Interior never heard of.

Mr. HAMLIN. If a man makes a correct statement and there are no suspicious circumstances connected with the report made, this provision, if allowed to remain in the law, would not be exercised and would, therefore, do no harm; but in case there should be suspicious circumstances surrounding a given case, I think the Government ought to have the right to examine the books. That privilege would not hurt anyone if they have made correct reports. I believe it ought to remain in.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I know; but this authorizes any petty agent to use oppressive power, and it ought not to be granted.

Mr. HAMLIN. "Any duly authorized agent," it says, "of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not think that the Secretary of the Interior would authorize some petty agent in the sense that I think the gentleman used that expression—some irresponsible agent.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Oh, no. A petty agent does not mean an irresponsible agent necessarily, but a petty agent means some agent having minor authority, who might in the course of administering the bill be granted this authority as far as the bill is concerned, and the Secretary of the Interior may never have heard of him. He might not have considered his qualifications with reference to this power, and yet this power might be given to him. I think it is an unreasonable and an oppressive power.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think that if these concerns make a fair and true return that this provision in the bill will not hurt anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana) there were—ayes 38, noes 35.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. SANDERS of Indiana and Mr. HAMLIN to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the amendment has been defeated, I suggest that the word "licenses" as it appears in the bill should be changed to "licensees."

That modification was included as a part of the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the word "licenses" be changed to "licensees" in line 19, page 6.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, object, if the gentleman is going to.

Mr. WALSH. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. Is this section open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. RAKER. And discussion?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. RAKER. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer it as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 19, strike out the word "licenses" and insert the word "licensees."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded within the meaning of this act when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any producer, manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, dealer, or other person in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; or (b) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of unreasonably increasing or diminishing the price.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, the only possible justification for this bill is the attempt to save a part of the tonnage now required for the importation of these various minor minerals. In order that the distinguished ex-Speaker may feel sure that there is no attempt on the part of the Government to stealthily introduce the principle of socialism into the mining industry——

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will yield, I would say that I did not have that in my mind.

Mr. LONDON. I desire to call his attention and the attention of other Members of the House to the testimony of Mr. De Wolff, State geologist of Illinois and president of the Association of American State Geologists. It appears that this bill was originally prepared some time in July of last year; that a few months after the beginning of the war they began to think of stimulating production. The bill traveled from group to group, and the geologists got hold of it in November. It was originally drafted by the office of the Secretary of the Interior, with the cooperation of the war minerals committee. It came to the State geologists in November, and the following interesting fact developed, that originally this bill included the larger metals and minerals, but, as explained by Mr. De Wolff, the National Association of Mining Engineers insisted that these larger metals and minerals be excluded. Had the more important metals and minerals been included there might have been some justification for the suspicion that Government control is in contemplation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LONDON. Pardon me; I have only a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LONDON. The National Association of Mining Engineers insisted that this bill be confined to minor minerals. In answer to my question Mr. De Wolf said this:

Mr. LONDON. The State geologists are all public agents, employees of the State governments? The Society of Geologists—of State geologists—are all public servants?

Mr. DE WOLF. State servants.

Mr. LONDON. While the members of the Society of Engineers are engineers employed by various interests?

Mr. DE WOLF. And in consulting practice; they are men of extended experience in the industry.

According to Mr. De Wolf, the bill in its original form included all minerals, and it provided as a last resort the taking over and the operation of the mines by the Government.

So we had this situation: That the State geologists, who are public servants, had no difficulty in approving the principles of this bill, while the Society of Engineers, associated with private interests, opposed the inclusion of the principal metals and minerals. So you see there is very little of the socialist principle about this proposition.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman remember that when the food-control bill was being considered in this House the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] offered an amendment including metalliferous mines in the food-control bill, and that those who sponsored that bill and the administration leaders in the House at that time were opposed to that amendment?

Mr. LONDON. I do not recall that particular instance. The point of it is this, that the hope is held out that this bill will encourage the production of minor minerals. Whether it will or not only heaven knows.

I do not know how attractive the price must be in order to encourage the production of minor minerals. That is all there is to this bill, and that is the difference between the powers conferred by this bill and the powers conferred upon the Government by the defense act. Under the defense act the Government may commandeer something which is in existence. This is to produce larger quantities of necessary articles.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman contend that we need all these minerals that are specified here in larger quantities than they are produced?

Mr. LONDON. One of the best known metallurgists in the country appeared before the committee. It looked as if he took the dictionary and enumerated every mineral he could find in it. I do not know how many of them are essential for war purposes. He went through the alphabet. But we will be told anyway that it is impossible to give us detailed information, because they can not disclose the particular use to which these minerals can be put.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this bill is intended, as I understand it, to encourage the production of the smaller and rarer metals. It does not include gold, silver, lead, or zinc.

Mr. FOSTER. Or copper.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Or copper, but it does include the rare kinds of metals. The need for encouraging their production has arisen in two ways. It has arisen, first, because of the scarcity of shipping to bring these metals into this country from Brazil, Spain, India, and Turkey. We can not afford to spare the shipping for that purpose. For instance, it is estimated that manganese alone will fall short in domestic production 560,000 tons in the coming year. It is estimated also that each ton of manganese that we import means 5 tons of shipping, so you will see that means a total of 2,500,000 tons of shipping. And that is a single article—only one in the list of things that are needed. So the first reason for the bill is that we need this shipping. Now, let us see just a moment. Go up and down the list of the necessities of this war. State them all, and you will find that the one thing that stands out as the primary requisite is shipping. You may talk about food, you may talk about soldiers, you may talk about munitions and cannon and supplies, but when you have gone over the list from top to bottom, from beginning to end of the alphabet, you find in the end that shipping is the primary need, and this bill tends to answer that need, because it will release ships from importing these various metals by speeding up their production in this country.

The second reason is this: We want in this country, so far as we can, to be self-sufficient for the purposes of carrying on the war. We do not want to have to resort to the other countries, because we do not know what the necessities and needs of the hour may be. We can not tell how conditions may change. We can not tell why and how it may become impossible, or how it may become difficult, to import from a given country; and we want here in our own midst, where we have these things, to produce them in sufficient quantities to meet the exigencies of this great world war.

Now, they answer us in this way: They say first that the War Finance Corporation can take care of this proposition. I say no. Why not? The War Finance Corporation is intended to finance existing corporations which are doing a solvent, good business. It is intended simply to assist them in this crisis, not because they would need help under ordinary conditions, but because of the fact that the war stress is such that any corporation which has an established business and which is able ordinarily to finance itself, needs help in these times. It is not intended at all, through the War Finance Corporation, to assist prospecting, to assist experiment, to develop a new business. And that is the purpose of this bill. It is to foster and create a business which does not exist, to send out the pioneers, to develop that which is new, that which is untried, and to make men secure in the development of it by saying to them, "While your prospecting and experimenting are uncertain, as to whether if you were left to yourselves you could make a return upon your investment, we will guarantee such a price as will give you an insured and adequate return, because it is the need of the Nation that calls upon you, and it is because of the war that we need to have you develop this industry, and the war need makes a Nation need, and justifies the Nation in guaranteeing the price. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. The only real shortage that we have, the gentleman will agree, that amounts to anything, is in manganese.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The bulk of that is produced in Montana. Now, as it has been multiplied by 6,000 per cent in the last five years, and will be more than doubled this year, over last year; does the gentleman think that you can take a man and say to him, "We will give you a fixed price for the manganese that you will produce"? When he has not the machinery he must get it, which means transportation; and that same guarantee must go to the Colorado Ryan properties that produce manganese.

You can not make fish of one and fowl of another. What would the expenditure be?

Mr. DEMPSEY. It is absolutely impossible, if the gentleman will permit, to say how the bill will work out in detail; but I say that we do face the fact that if we do not remedy the shortage of 560,000 tons we are going to use two million and a half tons of shipping that should be used to send boys, cannon, and supplies abroad. If we can do it in this way, and I believe we can; if we can help to do it in this way, and we surely can, we should make the experiment. It is not only justified but required. [Appluse.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I ask that the gentleman have one minute more, as I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The statement the gentleman has just made to save ships appeals to me. If this bill were passed, does the gentleman have any reason to believe from anything he knows that it would in the near future relieve our stringency in that respect; that is, during the present season, when we need the ships so badly, will the passage of the bill give us more ships?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I can answer the gentleman by stating what the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CANNON] has just said. We have grown from the production of 4,000 tons manganese to 240,000 tons in the incredibly short time from 1913 to 1917. If we can grow in production in that short period of time—and we are going to double it this year—why are we not going to relieve the shipping and relieve it speedily? Statistics show that there has been that surprising and that amazing growth.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Of course, if we can spend $50,000,000 and get ships in that way, it is just as easy as to spend it in building them.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Of course it is; and at the same time it answers the other purpose of the bill, which is making ourselves self-sufficient in producing within our own borders and from our own territory all those things essential to the war, and not leaving us to depend on foreign territory and its uncertainties and changes that are rapidly evolving in this world-wide war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. The testimony from the Shipping Board is that we will save from three to four hundred thousand dead-weight tons of shipping this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That whenever any necessaries shall be hoarded as defined in section 6 they shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same are found and seized by a process of libel for condemnation, and if such necessaries shall be adjudged to be hoarded they shall be disposed of by sale in such manner as to provide the most equitable distribution thereof as the court may direct, and the proceeds thereof, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid to the party entitled thereto. The proceedings of such libel cases shall conform as near as may be to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States. It shall be the duty of the United States attorney for the proper district to institute and prosecute any such action upon presentation to him of satisfactory evidence to sustain the same.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer to perfect the text.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be limited to 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 11, after the word "six," strike out the word "they" and insert the words "of this act the person, firm, copartnership, or corporation so holding the same," so that it will read:

"That whenever any necessaries shall be hoarded as defined in section 6 of this act the person, firm, copartnership, or corporation so holding the same shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same are found."

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is all right.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to call attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that this is a proceeding in rem and not in personam.

Mr. ROBBINS. I know that very well. I know that it is a proceeding "in rem," but it ought to be "in personam." If you read the section you will see that this is a proceeding against the ores or minerals wherever found, and then down in line 15 you will see the word "they," which refers to the minerals, and in line 19 you will see the word "party" is again used, providing that after paying the cost and charges the surplus shall be paid to the party entitled thereto. Then in line 21 you find this provision: "Except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case."

I submit that this section ought to be a proceeding "in personam" and not a proceeding "in rem," because this is a section that seeks to enforce the preceding section. The preceding section, section 6, refers entirely to the hoarding of these metals. The penalty for hoarding these metals is to proceed against the firm, person, or corporation that hoards them. They are the people guilty in this act, and they are the people against whom the proceedings must be instituted. This idea of going and searching out the "thing hoarded" and allowing the thing or minerals hoarded to appeal where a question of fact is raised makes it ridiculous.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. The proceeding against the person is in section 8.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is a criminal section and proceeding, and is a different thing. The proceeding in this section is a proceeding "in rem" against the thing which is analogous to a proceeding in law against real estate, the foreclosure of a mortgage. Here you are proceeding against a man for hoarding goods, and it is a proceeding against the person for a violation of the provisions of the statute.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Suppose a person should be located out of the jurisdiction. Suppose the hoarding of goods should be in one State and the person should be in another State, would you have the proceeding against the person?

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, there is a method provided by statute for suits against persons who are absent from the jurisdiction of the court. Service is had by publication and a foreign attachment proceeding.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is a statutory proceeding.

Mr. ROBBINS. Of course, there is a United States statute providing for that. The trouble about this section is that it could not be enforced. This is an attempt to set up a proceeding in admiralty, which pertains to proceedings against boats and ships. Here your proceeding is against the person, the firm, or the corporation that acquires this metal in bulk and holds it, and hoards it, for the purpose of increasing the price to the Government or to the manufacturers who are manufacturing war materials for the Government.

Mr. LONDON. Is not the object to get hold of the thing hoarded rather than to punish the person in an action for damages? The object of this section is to get hold of the very thing that the Government needs. So it is an action not only in law, but the spirit of it is that it is against the thing for the possession of that thing.

Mr. ROBBINS. You get control of the mineral when you proceed against the person hoarding it and seize the mineral or ore he is hoarding.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Apart from the amendment that the gentleman has offered, may I inquire his view as to whether we are justified in passing a provision of confiscation, as this paragraph provides, that does not regard the constitutional provision of not taking property without due compensation?

Mr. ROBBINS. This statute is a war measure. No person in this House, it has been reiterated over and over again, would vote for it under any other circumstances.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman believe that the constitutional protection and guaranty of not taking property without due compensation does not apply in time of war as well as in time of peace?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will answer the question by saying that this section provides specifically for trial by jury, and that is the only provision that saves this clause from being absolutely in the teeth of the Constitution.

Mr. STAFFORD. It provides for the confiscation and sale at any figure which may be received at public auction.

Mr. ROBBINS. If it be sold at public auction, that would be due process of law, and would, if fairly conducted, obtain for the owner fair and just compensation for the minerals or ore seized and taken from him.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am considerably disturbed with regard to this measure. I want to vote for and support every measure that is necessary for the prosecution of this war. I think that is the duty of every Member of the House, and it is to the credit of the membership of this House that everyone is performing his full duty, and if there is a disloyal Member of the House I do not know his name. The support which the administration has had by the membership of this House upon every bill that has been put forth as necessary for the successful conduct of the war has been remarkable. But I do not want to vote for a bill that has that for its purpose, if we already have some other law on the statute books through which we can accomplish the same purpose. I do want to vote against those bills that have for their object the building up of new departments and a big personnel in them at tremendous expense, the creating of new offices with large salaries, when we can accomplish the thing that that organization would accomplish without that expense.

Let us take the bills that we have already passed—I do not care which one you take, you will find unusual powers. There are a number of bills giving the President all the power this bill grants. Here is the food bill. It provides as follows:

SEC. 12. That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any factory, packing house, oil pipe line, mine, or other plant, or any part thereof, in or through which any necessaries are or may be manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined, and to operate the same.

Then, further, there is this other provision in section 10:

That the President is authorized, from time to time, to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or any other public use connected with the common defense, and to requisition, or otherwise provide, storage facilities for such supplies; and he shall ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor.

What broader powers could we give than the power we have given in that act? Does anyone contend that that does not give the President power to purchase these metals? Take the act of June 3, 1916, providing for further and more effectual provision for the national defense. Here, again, we gave the President the power not only to reach out and commandeer propery that may be necessary for the prosecution of this war and at a price which he said was fair and reasonable, but if the supply is not sufficient we gave him power to force an increased production. Take the things that are mentioned here in the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], which he placed in the RECORD. I understand there is not one of those minerals that we do not produce some quantity of in the United States. Is there a man here who says that the President can not go out and buy all that is necessary, either for the Army or the Navy or for any public use, under the authority which he now has?

Mr. FOSTER. Where would you get cobalt?

Mr. STAFFORD. In Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. I said in the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman desire to produce a home-market condition, justifying large prices for cobalt, if it can be secured in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Iowa said all these could be produced in the United States.

Mr. GOOD. If they can not be produced in the United States then the bill does not affect them, because the bill only affects those things that can be produced in the United States. If you are going to release this vast tonnage in shipping you must find the things you want right in the United States or Mexico or Canada. What is more to the point, if we need cobalt, why does not the President buy it in Canada? He has the authority and the money, and he can pay any price and no one can object.

Why, if you want manganese, if you want a million tons, the President has the money appropriated by Congress to buy it, and he has authority to purchase all that can be produced. No one can prevent his purchasing it where ships will not be necessary for transporting it.

If you wanted antimony the President has had authority to purchase all that is necessary either for the Army or the Navy, or what the steel companies need for public use and he can pay any price which he may elect to pay. What more authority do you want than this?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the time is limited.

The CHAIRMAN. The time was fixed by agreement.

Mr. GOOD. I understood there was 20 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. How much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes has been used.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up the time of the committee, and can conclude in five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman was to have 10 minutes. He said he desired 7 or 8 minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. He said five.

Mr. STAFFORD. He expressed himself as wanting seven or eight minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Let me have another five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will yield my time to the gentleman in order to allow the gentleman from Illinois to have his five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. No; go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the result of the agreement on the floor?

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood five minutes would be reserved for me, and I will yield that to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is rather a belated excuse for something that side of the House should have done. When you passed the Underwood bill before the outbreak of the war, when you took off the duty of $2.50 a ton on ferromanganese and placed it on the free list, then you desired to discourage production in metals. The certain metals schedule was similarly dealt with. The result was discouraging to American producers and encouraged production abroad. Now you wish to encourage American production again.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield there? Did not the gentleman just a moment ago say we ought not to pass this bill provided we could get cobalt from Canada?

Mr. GOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is a lame excuse for your taking off the duty on the product of the American miner who was producing these metals and then when we find we are in war and need them to reach out and ask the poor washerwomen and the banker alike to buy liberty bonds in order that you may rehabilitate the industries that you have destroyed.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I can not.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us not have politics, this is a war measure.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; it is said that this is a war measure, but I am inclined to think it is unnecessary. It will provide many jobs for deserving Democrats and to that extent it may be a war measure, but the power granted is already vested in the President. I regret that that side of the House was not far-sighted enough before the war, when we told you that you needed American production, that you ought to produce in America everything that could be produced that we use or could use, and yet you destroyed those industries and now you reach out and ask $50,000,000 to rehabilitate them. Protection would have saved them at the expense of the importer. No, gentlemen of the committee, there is not a power granted in this bill, except the authorization for an appropriation and the additional power to create a new department, that has not already been granted the President. Ah, if it is true that we could release thousands upon thousands of tons of shipping by purchasing these things of the American miner, then I say to you the fault is not with the House, the fault is not with Congress, the fault is in the correct exercise of these broad powers that we have granted.

Long ago you ought to have been producing manganese, antimony, and these things that you say you want to produce here in America. The President had the power to purchase. The first thing we did after we declared war was to give the President $100,000,000 to purchase things of this kind. Of course, this vast tonnage of ships should be released. It should be released at once. Do not wait for this authority; exercise the authority already granted and buy them at once. The authority and money have already been granted. Almost a year ago we granted this authority, and it should have been exercised long ago. We should have been buying antimony and manganese and bismuth—and all those things which you say you are going to buy, if this bill becomes a law—for a year. You have needed the ships all year. The President has the power to buy them now, at any price he may fix. He has the money in his hands with which to buy them, and there is no limitation on the price that he can pay. Why not exercise this power? Why create more useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has voted in this House, as other Members on that side have, for the support of the administration in this war. They are to be commended for doing that. I am not here to find fault with any man. They have loyally supported the administration in the carrying out of its war policies; but I do regret, my friends, that the gentleman from Iowa should see fit, upon the pretext of criticizing this bill, to find fault with things that he thinks should have been done a long time ago. The gentleman speaks of the President having $100,000,000 with which he could have bought cobalt, antimony, pyrites, manganese, and these other articles. The President has no power under the law to buy and sell those articles.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. He can buy but he can not sell them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He exercised power, I understand, by buying a lot of old junk in a hole in the ground up on Fifteenth Street.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Kansas upon this war measure, when it is necessary to secure some legislation for carrying on the war, sees fit now to lug in some other proposition on which he desires to criticize the President, and yet protests his loyalty to the Government at the same time. I am sorry, my friend——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the gentleman says——

Mr. FOSTER. I did not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I do not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman does not say that he could not, under the power that he has now, buy these needed war materials?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my friend from Kansas, if he will contain himself until some opportune time comes, when the House may be considering a proposition that is not as vital a war measure as this is, he can say what he likes in criticism of what the President has done if he thinks that there are things to do. But I do submit that under the guise of criticizing this bill and protesting their loyalty at the same time, they should not find fault with the President because he did not commence some time ago to buy $100,000,000 worth of pyrites, buy $100,000,000 worth of manganese, and do all those things. Supposing the President had done it? The same gentleman would have been here criticizing him because he had spent money for that purpose. I have no doubt about that. Let us be fair. I hope I have not been partisan in this House, and very few Members of this House have been partisan. I do not know that I call to my mind one. But I do submit that it is not the proper thing now to criticize the President in this way. Let us put this measure through. Let us not have it said six months from now that the Government is short on these materials because Congress failed to do its duty in helping to secure these necessary materials.

Mr. GOOD. Now, the gentleman is willing to admit that the President has power to purchase all of the things that are contemplated to be secured under this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I do not think he has.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman think now that the President would not have authority to purchase under the food bill or under the Army reorganization bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I think he might have the right to purchase or commandeer some of these articles, but I doubt he has the power to do all these necessary things provided in this bill to secure all of them.

Mr. GOOD. Not under the food bill?

Mr. FOSTER. He must take care of industrial uses in this country, too.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GARLAND. I was going to ask the gentleman from Iowa, as to this far-sighted policy that he refers to, if he himself ought not to have exercised it a little when he voted for the manufacture of armor plate by the Government, inasmuch as the country has to have manganese?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In regard to manganese, there are all kinds of it in the forest reserves owned by the Government. Can we not get it?

Mr. FOSTER. We can if we pass this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, can we not have it reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, after a conference with some of the gentlemen in charge, they claim that this is to be a proceeding in rem; and as I have no desire to change the proceeding if they insist on it, I withdraw the amendment with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That any person who, in order to enhance the price of necessaries, willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out in lines 3 and 4 the words "in order to enhance the price of necessaries."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON: Page 9, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "in order to enhance the price of necessaries."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a duplication of words in this section. As it now reads it is as follows:

That any person who, in order to enhance the price of necessaries, willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supplies.

I submit to the gentleman that language ought to go out.

Mr. FOSTER. That print is from the old bill. We did change that, but the printers did not get it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Have you not a paragraph that is in line with the bill passed the other day for the destruction of war material?

Mr. ANDERSON. Substantially so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. With the same form of punishment?

Mr. ANDERSON. With the same form of punishment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FESS. I do so in order to ask the chairman whether anywhere in the proposed law he has defined what are "necessaries."

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. These articles are defined to be "necessaries."

Mr. FESS. It is limited to them?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I thought you would not put it in a criminal statute without defining it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person, or who aids or abets any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transportating, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries shall, upon conviction, be fined not exceeding $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert, after the word "who," in line 8, page 9, the expression "in order to enhance the price of necessaries."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 9, line 8, after the word "who," insert the words "in order to enhance the price of necessaries."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it is my opinion that the committee, when it finally agreed upon the bill, had that expression in section 9, and inadvertently it was put in section 8; and I am seeking to put in this section the expression that was stricken out of section 8 by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Section 9 enumerates numerous things—(a), (b), (c), and (d). The first, (a), is to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) is to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) is to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; (d) is to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries.

Now, it may easily be imagined that any one of those things might be done without having any unlawful purpose in view, but if the expression "in order to enhance the price of necessaries" is inserted after the word "who," it will make the section a proper criminal statute.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Can the gentleman conceive of a condition where any of these things might be done unlawfully that would not fall under your classification in order to enhance the price?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I can not conceive of any such condition. On the other hand, I can conceive how you might agree to restrict the supply for a legitimate purpose.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. What language do I understand you propose to insert after the word "who"?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I propose to insert the language that was stricken out of section 8, "in order to enhance the price." I think that was agreed to by the committee, and through inadvertence it was put in the other section.

Mr. WINGO. No. It was agreed to, but in recasting the section it was left out deliberately. If you put it where you propose to put it, we would have a repetition, because that is not the only thing we propose to punish by this section. What we propose to do now is to punish any person who combines with or aids or abets any other person in doing any one of the several things mentioned in the clauses (a), (b), (c), and (d); in other words, if he conspires or combines with or aids or abets any other person in limiting the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries, or in restricting the supply of any necessaries, or in restricting the distribution of any necessaries, or for the purpose of preventing, limiting, or lessening the manufacture or production of any necessaries. There are several different acts enumerated.

Mr. ANDERSON. In other words, it is the combination or conspiracy that you punish here, not the intent that the individual has to combine with somebody else to do what is unlawful.

Mr. WINGO. No. I think possibly, if I recall the discussion of it, some of us contended that we ought to be a little more explicit to mean what you suggest. That is, that the language that we now have does not punish anything but the conspiracy. I think the language used punishes only the conspiracy to do these things, and does it without the language that the gentleman from Indiana proposes.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. If the amendment of the gentleman prevails, I am inclined to believe—and I make the suggestion for his consideration—that the man who had been arrested could very properly raise this defense: He could say that he could not be convicted, because his purpose in limiting the facilities for transportation was not to raise the price, but in order to embarrass his own country. He might possibly be convicted on some other charge, but he could acknowledge a crime and clear himself of the charge under this provision.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If he successfully made the defense that he did this for some other reason, he ought to go acquitted under this statute.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. That is true; but if the gentleman's amendment prevails then it will be necessary for the prosecution to prove absolutely that his purpose was——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Unlawful.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Not unlawful, but was to enhance the value.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. To be sure.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] that that limits the purpose of the section rather than extends it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not think I made my point very clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, may I, in the gentleman's time, inquire of the chairman of the committee how late he intends to run? It is now after half past 4, and there is a very small attendance here.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to finish this section and read section 10.

Mr. STAFFORD. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think perhaps if the gentleman would yield to me I could make a suggestion——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield to my friend.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will suggest to my friend from Indiana that the proposed amendment would, it seems to me, place upon the Government the burden not only of proving the offense but of proving the intent.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It always has to do that anyway.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; that is not true.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The intent follows the act.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The intent, as a general rule, follows the act itself.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You have to introduce the evidentiary facts in order to prove the intent.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I am afraid the amendment proposed would put the onus upon the Government to establish affirmatively the intent as a separate fact. I am afraid, in other words, that the proof of the act itself, no matter how clear it might be, would not entitle the Government to a conviction, but that the Government would have to establish guilt by adding to the proof of the act the proof of the intent as a separate factor.

While I am on my feet I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] also to this, in reference to the suggestion made by him: This section as drawn, as was suggested by the gentleman from Arkansas, seems to punish simply the conspiring and combining, aiding or abetting, and not the doing of the act. Now, should there not be after the word "necessary," in line 15, something added, so that you could convict for the doing of the act either separately or with others?

Mr. WINGO. Since I was on the floor my memory has been refreshed, and my attention is called to section 4. By that section we make unlawful the acts, and by this section we punish conspiracy to commit these unlawful acts.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I see. I apologize to the gentleman from Indiana for taking so much of his time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] to this fact: In order to prosecute a conspiracy successfully there must be some unlawful purpose for the conspiracy. Now, there is nothing in this section 9 but what might be entirely lawful. There either ought to be some characterization like that offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] or else the word "unlawfully" should be inserted somewhere.

Mr. DEMPSEY. "Unlawfully" would be all right.

Mr. WINGO. In section 4 we declare the doing of these things unlawful, and then subsequently we punish the conspiracy to do the things which at another place in the same act are declared to be unlawful. In view of that fact does the gentleman think it is necessary to insert the word "unlawful" here?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not think so.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. For this reason, in section 4 you are not proving a penalty. This is purely a criminal section and there ought to be set out some unlawful purpose; in order for a successful prosecution for conspiracy there must be an unlawful purpose. The word "unlawful" should be added or the things enumerated in (a), (b), and (c.).

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In further proof that section 7 originally contained the provision I call the committee's attention to the fact that section 9 in the food bill had the same provision that I am seeking to place in this section, except that it was in the latter part of the section. On page 4 of the food bill, section 9, is the expression "in order to enhance the price thereof."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman agree that in the food bill the clause he refers to refers to subsection d as the crime rather than——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I was afraid of that interpretation, and in the committee I took it out and put it in the top line.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to point out why I think it is absolutely necessary to put the qualifying words in the section. Section 9 does not deal alone with conspiracies and combinations, but also with agreements and arrangements. If the section of the bill is left as it now stands, you will have a violation of the criminal law for any two men to agree to limit the facilities for transportation of any of these necessaries, although it may be for a wise and legitimate purpose, or to make an arrangement to that effect, no matter what sort of a purpose they may have.

Under section (b) if two men agree or arrange to restrict the supply of any of the necessaries, no matter how lawful or worthy the object, it will be a violation of the section. If they have agreed to arrange to restrict the distribution, no matter what purpose they have, they will be subject to the drastic penalty of this provision.

But if the section is made to read as the food law reads, and as it should be interpreted, it will make only those things a crime when they are done for the purpose of enhancing the price. That is the object of the legislation. In other words, if they undertake to limit the transportation to enhance the price it will be a violation of the law. If they agree to restrict the supply in order to enhance the price, it will be a violation of the law. What is the objection to their restricting the supply unless it does enhance the price. If they undertake to restrict the distribution of it to enhance the price it will be a violation of the law. If they arrange to do any of these things for some other purpose then it should not be a violation of the law. If they have some other object in view which is unlawful, and you want the law to cover that, then you have another matter, which can be reached by appropriate criminal legislation. But this ought not to be left in the shape that it is at the present, so that an undertaking to do a laudable thing subjects anyone to fine and imprisonment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKEOWN. As I gather, the gentleman wants to make it plain what the unlawful acts consist of.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Would it not be wise to add these words, "in order to enhance the value and impede the Government in the progress of this war"?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I would have no objection to the insertion of any phrase which would make unlawful things that ought to be made unlawful.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the statement just made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] affords one reason why possibly the amendment of the gentleman ought not to prevail. The question as to whether the amendment should be sustained depends on what is sought. If we consider this paragraph simply as a sort of antitrust measure, I quite agree with my friend from Indiana that the amendment ought to be inserted. But if as a war measure it is absolutely necessary that the Government should not be impeded in any kind of way in obtaining these materials and therefore it is sought to forbid not only the enhancement of the price but any attempt to prevent the Government from getting hold of the materials, of receiving them at any time, and gathering them together for necessary purposes, then I can see why the paragraph ought to remain in its original form.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose two producers of an article get together and agree that they will not erect storage warehouses. That would limit the storage for materials; not intending to enhance the price but for a valid reason, does the gentleman believe we should make it a crime to carry out a valid business agreement?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is supposing something that would not come within the provisions of the statute in any way.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not even require it to be unlawful. The gentleman is not acquainted with the phraseology of the paragraph.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman is entirely acquainted with it. He has read it and reread it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I direct the gentleman's attention to subdivision (a) of section 9 and ask whether that does not apply to that very case?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A penalty can not be enforced simply because an act might in some kind of way be included within the provisions. If a penalty is enforced at all, it is enforced because it necessarily comes within the provisions; and the mere fact that a man combines with some others not to erect a storehouse would not subject him to any of the penalties of this paragraph. Criminal laws are always construed strictly, and nothing is included by implication.

Mr. HAMLIN. Can not the gentleman also see, if the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is adopted, when the Government might find itself in this condition? It might appear that an injury had been done or a crime had been committed due to a conspiracy formed unlawfully, and yet the Government could not prove that the purpose of that conspiracy and the object of it was to "enhance the price" and therefore, if the amendment be adopted, the Government would fail to secure a conviction notwithstanding a great injury had been done to the Government.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is all very true, and yet I perhaps would hardly want to oppose the amendment upon that ground. In peace times I would think that we ought to have the provision inserted that the gentleman from Indiana desires through his amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the enhancement of the price is the only thing you want to prevent, then the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] ought to be adopted, but I think we want to cover a broader field.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. I think the whole question of whether the amendment should be adopted rests upon that point.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do, too.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Suppose two miners got together and agreed to lay off on the Fourth of July. That would restrict the supply of necessaries.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman from Iowa has very well answered that argument. I do not think it enters into this at all, because if their purpose was innocent and not intending to commit any crime against the Government they could not be convicted. It is nonsense to talk about their being convicted under the circumstances just mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] informs me that this provision was taken from the Canadian act.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the provision was taken from the food act. The provisions of the food act may have been taken from the Canadian act. The food act contains a provision that I want to put in here.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In respect to food, I scarcely see how war preparation could be affected, unless the price of food was raised, and I think the provision was very properly put in that act.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it not an inevitable consequence of a restriction of the supply of necessaries that the price of necessaries shall be enhanced. A restriction of the supply of luxuries does not necessarily enhance the price, because you can do with or without luxuries, in your discretion. If they are necessaries, however, which you must have, if the supply is restricted it enhances the price naturally in the market.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That would be the inevitable effect, and, as the gentleman from Wisconsin might have suggested further, the only result of the change in this particular case would be to throw an additional burden on the Government in making out its case.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Suppose 100 laborers should strike and remain on a strike for three weeks. Could they be prosecuted under section (b), the way it is written now? That would restrict the supply of necessaries.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman must remember that all through this is carried the necessary implication that the purpose must be proved; that is, the purpose to restrict the output. Unless this is shown, the conspiracy will not be made out. This purpose is not shown by proving that such a result might follow. I am not, however, asserting that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana should be rejected. I am only presenting some matters that I think should be considered before a vote is taken.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, to-morrow will be the one hundredth anniversary of the proclamation of President James Monroe putting into operation the Rush-Bagot treaty, which provided for disarmament upon the Great American Lakes. At the time it was negotiated it was not dignified by the word "treaty." It was rather given the modest designation of "an exchange of notes."

Letters were exchanged between Richard Rush, Acting Secretary of State, and Charles Bagot, British minister to the United States. The negotiations were of the greatest simplicity. On April 28, 1817, Mr. Bagot wrote Mr. Rush that his Government had authorized him to accede to the proposition which had been made to him by Mr. Rush, which was:

> That the naval force to be maintained upon the American Lakes by His Majesty and the Government of the United States shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels on each side; that is:
>
> On Lake Ontario to one vessel not exceeding 100 tons burden and armed with one 18-pound cannon.
>
> On the upper Lakes to two vessels not exceeding like burden each and armed with like force.
>
> On the waters of Lake Champlain to one vessel not exceeding like burden and armed with like force.
>
> And His Royal Highness agrees that all other armed vessels on these lakes shall be forthwith dismantled and that no other vessels of war shall be there built or armed.
> His Royal Highness further agrees that if either party should hereafter be desirous of annulling this stipulation and should give notice to that effect to the other party, it shall cease to be binding after the expiration of six months from the date of such notice.

The following day Mr. Rush wrote a cordial letter to Mr. Bagot, in which he said:

> The undersigned has the honor to express to Mr. Bagot the satisfaction which the President feels at His Royal Highness the Prince Regent's having acceded to the proposition of this Government as contained in the note alluded to. And in further answer to Mr. Bagot's note the undersigned, by direction of the President, has the honor to state that this Government, cherishing the same sentiments expressed in the note of the 2d of August, agrees that the naval force to be maintained upon the Lakes by the United States and Great Britain shall henceforth be confined to the following vessels—

Named in Mr. Bagot's letter. It will be noticed that the armaments were reduced to the point of practically a revenue police service.

This is an almost forgotten page of history. Something like 99 people out of 100 have fallen into the mistake of believing that disarmament upon the Great Lakes dated from the treaty of Ghent, December 24, 1814. It is true that peace with Great Britain dates from the treaty of Ghent, but would that peace have endured had hostile battle fleets floated upon the Great Lakes during the past century?

Mr. Chairman, the life of the treaty was threatened more than once. Either party had the right to annul it upon six months' notice. Its existence was threatened during the Fenian raids of 1837 and again by reason of the excitement over the case of McLeod in the forties. The most serious menace to the life of this treaty, however, was on account of private shipbuilding interests a quarter of a century ago. On the 4th day of April, 1892, Senator McMillan, of Michigan, presented a petition of the iron shipbuilding companies of the Great Lakes praying for the early and complete abrogation of the treaty. On April 8, 1892, Senator McMillan introduced a resolution requiring the Secretary of War to inform the Senate whether any bids had been received for war vessels from shipbuilding companies on the Great Lakes and whether any such bids were refused or rejected for any reason or reasons other than such as follow from the usual rule in accepting or rejecting bids for that class of work; and if so, the reasons therefor.

On May 5, 1892, the Secretary of War reported that there had been three bids received for the construction of a first-class torpedo boat; that two of the bids were rejected upon the usual grounds; and the third, that of F. W. Wheeler & Co., of Bay City, Mich., being the lowest bid, was rejected, the reason assigned being that the department could not, under existing treaty stipulations, award a contract for the construction of a vessel of war upon the Great Lakes.

On April 8, 1892, a resolution was also passed by the Senate asking the Secretary of State to inform the Senate whether the Rush-Bagot treaty was still in force. Secretary of State John W. Foster replied, on December 7, 1892, expressing the opinion that it was still in force. In the meantime public sentiment had been somewhat aroused and to such an extent that the ironship building companies and others interested with them abandoned the idea of securing an abrogation of the treaty. No one, so far as known, has even suggested since then that the treaty should be abrogated. It has lived through a century and has doubtless been a great factor in maintaining the peaceful relations between this country and Great Britain which has existed since the signing of the treaty of Ghent.

The Great Lakes cover an area of 97,850 square miles and have over 5,000 miles of shore line. They are greater in extent than the Bering Sea, six times as large as the Baltic Sea, and almost as large as the Mediterranean. Many cities have been built along their shores, among them the great cities of Chicago and Milwaukee; Duluth, that will soon rival Pittsburgh; Detroit, Port Huron, and Bay City, three important cities of Michigan; Toledo and Cleveland, in Ohio; and the great city of Buffalo, in the Empire State; and on the Canadian side Port Arthur, Sault Ste. Marie, Goderich, Sarnia, Hamilton, Kingston, and Toronto. These are the more important cities, by no means all of them.

A kind Providence has smiled upon the commerce of these Lakes, dedicated to peace by the wise men of two great nations. Thirty-seven millions of people live in the eight bordering States, according to the census of 1910, more than one-third of the entire population of the North American Continent, and one-third of the total tonnage of North America is on the Great Lakes.

The development of the Lakes country is almost as little known as the treaty by which its commerce was permitted to grow unfettered by the frowns of guns on land or water. How many know that there is upon the Great Lakes the largest fleet of freighters on earth; and that its cities have grown more rapidly than Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or San Francisco? The freight handled on the Great Lakes amounts to six times as much as the freight of all the nations passing through the Suez Canal. To get an idea of the immensity of the Lakes traffic it may be said that in one year there were added 40 bulk freighters with a total capacity of 360,000 tons. To carry the same amount would require over 300 trains of 30 cars each, or a single train 70 miles long.

Dedicated to peace, the boundary Lakes have been in the past and will be in the future a great factor in preventing excessive railroad rates. Every farmer in the Northwest who has shipped a bushel of grain or purchased a ton of coal has been benefited in this respect: every consumer of the products of western farms or the products of the mines of Minnesota, Michigan, and Wisconsin has also been benefited by the Lakes transportation rates. And so these Lakes, which have somehow existed without the protection of armed ships of war, have been a blessing directly or indirectly to all the people of the United States and Canada.

It is difficult during this time of war to discuss peace problems. The thought of the Nation is almost entirely centered upon the war. The discussion of a premature peace is not only distasteful to real Americans but, to my mind, highly undesirable and mischievous. But sooner or later normal conditions will return. When that time comes it will be well for thoughtful Americans, and, indeed, the people of all nations, to keep in mind the wise and beneficent disarmament treaty entered into 100 years ago. And in this time of national stress, of all-absorbing war problems, may we not pause long enough to take off our hats to the prophets of a century ago, Richard Rush and Charles Bagot, who did so much to preserve peace among the Anglo-Saxon peoples? [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, just a word before the vote on the amendment is taken. I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment. We discussed this very proposition very fully in the committee. I wish to offer this suggestion to my colleague. Action in order to enhance the price is really not the prime and only thing we want to punish. Limiting the production of those things that we need would be a more serious offense, in my judgment, than conspiracy for the purpose of enhancing the price, but now, if the gentleman will turn to section 4 of the bill——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. It might become a bother to the Government, where we have guaranteed the price and the production is more than the country can consume, to limit the production, and yet the gentleman would make that a penal offense.

Mr. WINGO. No; the gentleman is going far afield.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit further, a later provision provides that the President shall even be authorized to levy tariff duties if there are going to be any supplies coming from abroad that will destroy or lower the guaranteed price.

Mr. WINGO. That does not have anything to do with private domestic production.

Mr. STAFFORD. And yet it might be to the interest of the Government to have private production lessened.

Mr. WINGO. I do not think any court would hold we are trying to legislate to penalize the Government——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will permit us——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How much longer is the gentleman going to run?

Mr. FOSTER. We want to finish this section and read the other one through.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, as I started to say, if gentlemen will read section 4, you will find that section makes the doing of these things, the doing of these acts unlawful, and to be frank, I think in the last two lines of section 4, page 5, we take care of the conspiracy proposition. But the provisions of section 4 make these things unlawful. That being true, it is not necessary to use the word unlawful in section 9. I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not the gentleman think in a penal statute that is so severe in its penalties as this statute is in this section that there ought to be an intentional doing of an act or of things forbidden?

Mr. WINGO. Well, in order to answer the gentleman to my satisfaction, I would have to go into all the presumptions that flow from the doing of an act wrong per se. When a man does a thing it is presumed that he intends the natural consequences of his act. No sane man would do the things prohibited by this provision without a wrongful intent, doing what he knew was not only wrong, but also harmful to the country and unlawful by statute.

Mr. ROBBINS. If a man in a shipyard would take a holiday, would it be embraced in this section?

Mr. WINGO. I submit to the gentleman he can not find any court that would adopt such a strained construction. This is not to prevent a workman from going and taking a holiday, and I do not think anything in this section would prevent a workman from striking if he wanted to.

Mr. GARLAND. Suppose a number of them go on a strike, would it?

Mr. WINGO. I think not.

Mr. ROBBINS. It would undoubtedly do that, because there would be an agreement to cease work and limit production.

Mr. WINGO. If men strike, not for the purpose of bettering their condition, but in order to hinder war preparations, then they should be punished.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then you ought to have the word "unlawful" in this section, and then you would have it protected by the other section.

Mr. WINGO. In section 4 these same acts are declared unlawful.

Mr. STAFFORD. This does not refer to section 4.

Mr. WINGO. It does. You have declared certain things to be unlawful in section 4, and then in section 9 you make it a penal offense to conspire to do any of these things which in section 4 you made unlawful.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The prime consideration is that an act must be read as a whole and not separately.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If you are correct in your contention that all is covered in section 4 makes unlawful all in section 9, then in order to make the two consistent each one must be for the purpose of prosecuting an unlawful act. I agree with the gentleman in the main in his contention; but if you will take and read section 4 and then take and read section 9, we will find some of the things are not specifically defined in section 4. I would therefore suggest to the gentleman that the word "unlawfully," after the word "who," in first line of section 9, will cure whatever defect may have been made by reason of all in section 9 not being included in section 4. And in the event that it is, it can not hurt anything and it will make both sections certain.

Mr. WINGO. To be frank with the gentleman, I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would not hurt anything.

Mr. WINGO. I prefer that to the amendment the gentleman has offered.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I offer as a substitute to the amendment proposed that the word "unlawfully" be added after the word "who," in line 8, page 9.

Mr. WINGO. The committee is prepared to accept that, though unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear the amendment as he stated it. It certainly ought to be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 9, line 8, after the word "who," insert the word "unlawfully."

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has debate on this section been exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. LONDON. There seems to be a typographical error here. The expression "who, in order to enhance the price of necessaries," which appears in this bill in lines 3 and 4, page 9, should have appeared in lines 8 and 9.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. That has been disposed of.

Mr. LONDON. There is no doubt but that is a typographical error.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. That has been taken out.

Mr. LONDON. I know it has been taken out in lines 3 and 4, but the committee intended it should be in lines 8 and 9. In other words, it should follow the word "person" in line 8, section 9, so that the section would read:

That any person who, in order to enhance the price of necessaries, conspires, combines, agrees—

And so forth.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. That is the amendment presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. LONDON. I was under the impression that the amendment had been adopted by the committee.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. No.

Mr. LONDON. There is no reason why the committee should oppose it here. When the bill was before the committee, after considerable discussion, it reached the agreement that it was necessary in order to protect workers in case of a strike for the purpose of improving their condition, and not with the object of limiting the output.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit, inasmuch as he was absent I will say that we have been discussing that very amendment, that very proposition, and I think, if the gentleman will recall, the committee, after thoroughly going into this, stood by the language as it is now, and we specifically cut out the language that he is now asking to be restored.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. I do.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is not the gentleman's recollection that in the committee we did so amend section 9 as to include after the word "who" the expression "in order to enhance the price of necessaries"?

Mr. LONDON. The recollection of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] seems to conflict with your recollection and mine. I am under the impression that we decided to incorporate the phrase "in order to enhance the price of necessaries."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is my recollection. Let me ask the gentleman a question. If section 9 is left as it now reads, and there is a strike at any plant producing these necessaries, is it the gentleman's opinion that every person joining in that strike would be guilty of this crime under subdivisions (c) and (d)?

Mr. LONDON. There is not the slightest doubt about it, no matter what the strike was for. The country has been very fortunate so far as strikes are concerned. There is complete cooperation with organized labor, and the only sections of the country where they suffer are those sections where the employers are a band of pirates and the workers are not given a chance to organize, so that in some sections the I. W. W. are merely working out the law of compensation. Where the employers are a band of thieves and conscienceless oppressors, there they have the I. W. W. to deal with, but wherever the employers have learned to recognize the right of the working people to improve their condition by collective efforts there has been no trouble, and there will be no trouble.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman answered affirmatively the question of the gentleman from Indiana, that a strike would come under the ban of this section.

Mr. LONDON. I so believe. Otherwise I would not try to take up the time of the House.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman does not want to say that when workmen strike their purpose is to "limit the facilities or the production or the manufacture of these materials"? In other words, that the purpose of the workingmen in striking is to injure the Government rather than better their condition. I do not think so.

Mr. LONDON. I have a pretty fair knowledge of the laws relating to labor unions. There is a section in the criminal code of New York State which affirmatively declares that the action of workmen in striking for the purpose of improving their conditions and getting better wages shall not be held a crime, because before that it was almost uniformly interpreted as a criminal conspiracy, and it was necessary to affirmatively declare it in the law of New York. I am familiar with the decisions of the courts in reference to the laws regarding the rights of workingmen. There is no reason why you should hamper workers who are resisting exploitation.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think there ought to be something in this law to punish men for doing these things for other purposes than merely enhancing the price of the materials.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not the gentleman think that "unlawful" would be the better expression? Because there is a law which prevents men from striking for purposes other than that of bettering their condition.

Mr. LONDON. There is no Federal law covering that.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. McKEOWN. This is an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS]. It was prepared as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, let the amendment be read, so that it will be in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN to the amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Add to the amendment the words "or for the purpose of impeding the Government in carrying on the war," so that it will read, "in order to enhance the price of necessaries or for the purpose of impeding the Government in carrying on the war."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House, under the previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, April 28, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting for the consideration of Congress copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation required by the health department of the Panama Canal for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1069); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copy of the findings of fact, with an opinion of the court, per curiam, in the case of the Yankton Sioux Indians v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1069); to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. McCLINTIC, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 139) granting to the State of Oklahoma 210,000 acres of unappropriated nonmineral land for the benefit of its agricultural and mechanical colleges according to the provisions of the acts of July 2, 1862, and July 23, 1862, and authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the Secretary of the Interior certifying the number of acres available and that there are not sufficient lands in the State of Oklahoma to comply with the provisions of this act, to pay the State of Oklahoma in lieu thereof the sum of $1.25 per acre for the number of acres due said State, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 526), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10459) granting a pension to Jean N. Roach, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: A bill (H. R. 11736) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Richard Rush and Charles Bagot at Duluth, Minn.; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. BELL: A bill (H. R. 11737) to provide for the erection of a public building at the city of Winder, Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11738) to provide for the erection of a public building at the city of Buford, Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11739) to establish a fish hatchery and fish station in the ninth congressional district of Georgia; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11740) authorizing the erection of a post-office building at Commerce, Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11741) to construct a suitable building for the use of the United States Court at Gainesville, Ga., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11742) to provide for the erection of a public building at the city of Canton Ga.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, April 28, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God in Heaven, whose glory shines round about us with ever-increasing splendor, and which discloses Thy wisdom, power, and goodness in every creative act, from the smallest grain of sand on the seashore to the farthest star that gilds the heavens; from the tiniest blade of grass to the most gigantic tree of the forest; from the most infinitesimal germ of life to man, the crowning glory of Thy creative acts, upon whom Thou hast bestowed the power of choice and thus dignified him as the architect of his own fortune—a stupendous responsibility, yet the evidence of Thy trust in him to meet the conditions of life and make for himself a character worthy of the highest admiration.

We meet here to-day, within these historic walls, to memorialize a man who for years was a conspicuous figure on the floor of this House—striking in his personality; strong in his intellectual, moral, and spiritual endowment; rising ever to the full measure of every trust reposed in him by his fellows; leaving behind him a record worthy of emulation.

We mourn his going, and our hearts go out in the warmest sympathy to those who knew and loved him; especially to the daughter who looked to him for strength, guidance, comfort. May the heart inspire the words of his colleagues that his name may live in history, a beacon light to guide those who shall come after us.

Comfort us all by the blessed hope of the immortality of the soul and inspire us to live worthy of the blessings Thou hast bestowed upon us and we will praise Thy Holy Name, in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SULLOWAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. WASON by unanimous consent.

Ordered, That Sunday, April 28, 1918, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. CYRUS A. SULLOWAY, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, several Members of the House who have signified their intention of speaking to-day are unable to be present. I ask unanimous consent that any Member who desires may extend or print in the RECORD remarks on the life and character and service of the late Representative SULLOWAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that Members desiring to do so may extend or print in the RECORD remarks on the life, character, and service of the late Representative SULLOWAY. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution and move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 329.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. CYRUS A. SULLOWAY, late a Member of this House from the State of New Hampshire.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, from my youth to the date of his death, CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY was an acquaintance and a friend. That acquaintance and friendship covered a period of about 40 years. During that period I knew him as a resident and citizen of the county in which I was born and have since lived. I knew him as a member of our State legislature, as Congressman from the first New Hampshire district, and I knew him as a lawyer, both of us practicing in the same courts.

He was born in Grafton, N. H., June 8, 1839, where his boyhood days were spent on his father's farm. In that town his early education was obtained in the public schools. Later, by his own industry and perseverance, with slight assistance from his parents, he was able to take a partial course of instruction at Kimball Union Academy.

In 1863 he was admitted to the bar of New Hampshire, and a few months later went to Manchester, N. H., and began the practice of law, which he followed until March 4, 1895, when he took his seat as a Representative in Congress from the first congressional district of his native State, which position by successive reelections he held, with the exception of two years (Mar. 4, 1913, to Mar. 4, 1915), until the date of his death.

In the early sixties, while he was studying law in Franklin, N. H., he three times voluntarily enlisted in the Union Army, three times determined and eager to defend his country, each time he was rejected by the Army surgeons owing to his physical condition.

The deceased Congressman was a self-made man. In early life his environments were humble but wholesome. He early in life was industrious and straightforward. These became his life characteristics.

In that typical rugged country of central New Hampshire he early learned nature and developed a love for her picturesque hills and valleys, her bubbling, sparkling streams, her green fields, and her forests. Here he learned to follow the winding brook with rod and line. This pastime was his favorite diversion from work and furnished sport through all the later years of his busy life.

In his chosen profession, by industry and conscientious application to his work, and conscientious efforts for his clients, he soon established himself in a large practice and was recognized as an able, forceful advocate in the trial of cases. It could be truthfully said of him that during his 30 years of active practice of law a poor and needy but worthy person, unable to recompense him fully for his legal efforts and services, received the same careful attention, and perhaps greater attention, than did the person possessing means and financial ability. Money for services to be rendered was not the guiding star of his professional life. The guiding star in his profession was justice—a star with brilliant luster radiating from a pedestal of justice. In his private office he would listen to the story of the poor and needy with care and patience, and later an opulent client might relate to him his story and receive only the degree of care and patience given to the humble and needy.

For years he was a central figure in our trial courts; the spectators' seats of the courtroom would be filled with people eagerly listening to his advocacy of a client's cause to a jury.

His dealings with members of his profession were frank, upright and candid. His criticism of an opposing client and witnesses was unique, piercing, and merciless, yet free from personal malice.

As a citizen he was kind; he was thoughtful, free from sham and demagogy; he enjoyed and loved his neighbors and his people, and these tenets were reciprocated by all who knew him.

As a member of the State legislature he was unassuming, a forceful advocate and a potential force on the side of any measure that he espoused. During his five terms in that body he was recognized as a leader, a popular and strong member. I remember well a legislative contest on a very important matter which Mr. SULLOWAY was opposing. The matter was being pressed for action. The opponents felt that a delay of a day or two would be to their advantage. The only way to prevent action on this particular day was to occupy the time in argument The opponents pressed Mr. SULLOWAY into action immediately; he secured recognition soon after 5 o'clock in the afternoon and talked continuously until 3 o'clock the next morning. About midnight, when the opponents as well as others were tired and hungry, he was informed that a lunch had been prepared at a certain place near the capitol; with a smile he told the members of the fact, and suggested that if they were hungry and not absent from the hall for more than two hours such absence would not prejudice their cause, as he would be unable to finish his speech within that time. When he finished, having spoken continuously for nearly 10 hourse, he showed little or no sign of fatigue other than slight hoarseness.

In Congress he soon became a tower of strength, and true to the instincts of his early manhood, evidenced by his eagerness to enter the conflict in the Civil War, he espoused the cause of the veterans of that war and their relatives. He analyzed their needs with such clearness, such force and integrity, that he became chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and retained that position for 12 years until the Republicans lost control of the House of Representatives in 1911. It is proper for me to say that no veteran of that war or a member of his family, who had a just cause for relief, ever found a deaf ear in my former colleague.

In a conspicuous place in the statehouse at Concord, N. H., is an oil painting, life-size, of the deceased Congressman, procured through the efforts of members of the New Hampshire State Veterans' Association and by them presented to the State, there to remain a token and a memorial of their love and affection for him whose heart beat in sympathy with theirs, whose voice extolled their virtues, and whose efforts secured relief for them and their dependents.

In public life he placed duty first. His friendships, his home cares or ties, were always subservient to his public activities in Congress, to which a faithful constituency had elected him 11 times. During the last days of his life it almost seemed that he had a premonition that his activities would soon cease. What else could have impelled him three days before death to tell a personal friend and veteran of the Civil War that he was not afraid to die, that he sincerely regretted that his efforts for the veterans and their dependents must cease? To another personal friend, shortly before lapsing into a state of coma, he made certain requests for immediate attention to matters of interest to some of his constituents.

From boyhood to death his life was one of faithful and earnest devotion to duty; from a child until death his life was filled with charitable effort and thoughts; kindness was his jewel; charity his pearl; devotion to his loved ones, his constituents, and his colleagues in Congress was his diamond; justice was his earthly emblem of heaven.

His large stature, in weight 280 pounds, in height 6 feet and 7 inches, was indicative of his very nature. His heart was proportionate thereto; it furnished room to share the sorrows of others. His large hand and long arm were ever ready to lighten the burdens and ills of others. His busy life was never too busy to prevent his turning aside to alleviate suffering or soften grief. Above his statesmanship, his power of speech, his humor, above his intense Americanism, shines the golden goodness and greatness of his heart. He will be forever remembered for

> That best portion of a good man's life:
> His little nameless, unnumbered acts
> Of kindness and of love.

It was with sorrow that we learned of his sudden death. Personally we shall miss him more than words can express. His district, State, Nation, and thousands of personal friends have lost a true friend, a man in every sense of the word. In the words of Antony over Brutus:

> His life was gentle; and the elements
> So mixed in him that nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

Obsequies of the Hon. CYRUS A. SULLOWAY were held March 14, 1917, in the Franklin Street Congregational Church of Manchester, N. H. He was buried in the family lot in Franklin, N. H. Thirty Members of Congress accompanied the body by special train from Washington. The church was incapable of furnishing standing room to the large throng of people who came to pay their last tribute to the deceased. Business was suspended in Manchester—his home city—during the services at the church.

The legislature, being in session, recessed. The governor, the governor's council, members of the senate and house of representatives, and State officials attended in a body. Members of the Grand Army of the Republic and auxiliary orders were present; also members of the Elks and Knights of Pythias. The floral tributes were numerous and beautiful.

The Rev. Burton W. Lockhart, of Manchester, N. H., conducted the funeral service, and the Rev. Samuel Russell, of Lawrence, Mass., delivered the address, as follows:

"Milton says that 'Death is the golden key that opens the palace of eternity.' By a turn of that key, of which the great poet wrote, a unique and national figure has suddenly and unexpectedly stepped through the door of eternity into the realms of the unseen. As we think of the great loss which the State of New Hampshire and the entire Nation has sustained by the exodus of this notable man, we are reminded of the words of King David at the grave of Abner, 'Know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?' These words of King David may be appropriately applied to New Hampshire's great Congressman, CYRUS A. SULLOWAY.

"Mr. SULLOWAY was great in his physical stature. He towered head and shoulders above many of his colleagues in Congress. He was doubtless one of the most picturesque and commanding figures among all the Nation's representatives at the Capitol. One can hardly think of Mr. SULLOWAY in connection with death. He was so alive, so vital and vigorous in action, in thought, and in word, that he left the impression of eternal youth. Although he had nearly rounded out four score years he never seemed like an old man. His great physique seemed to be permeated with the elixir of perpetual youth.

"Mr. SULLOWAY was also great in his accomplishments. Like Abraham Lincoln, his boyhood and youth was spent on a farm, where he early learned to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. We are told that the strongest trees are found not in the sheltered nooks but in the most exposed places, where sweeps the full fury of the storm; that the hardiest flowers grow not in the hothouse but on the mountain side, in close proximity to the glacier and the snow. Congressman SULLOWAY was not a hothouse plant. He grew up among the rugged peaks of the old Granite State; he breathed the air of the bleak hills and the uplands, and he seemed to have imbibed the bracing atmosphere, so that his very presence was like a breeze from the mountains, inspiring and invigorating. He came forth not from the lap of luxury or the home of affluence, but from the humble home, where, if he had remained, he must necessarily have lived a circumscribed life. But he was not satisfied to be a mediocre man. He was ambitious to make the most of life's opportunity and he was willing to pay the price which brings success. His struggles developed his strength, and the difficulties which he was forced to encounter quickened inventiveness and inspired resolution. He used the obstacles in his way as stepping stones and steadily climbed upward until he reached the National Capitol. There for 20 years he served his constituency, and there he died at his post of duty, a true servant of the people he represented.

"To have achieved such success he must have had some great qualities of heart and mind. Nature did much for him. He had a unique personality and great native ability; he had also a trained mind and an indomitable will and a great heart filled with love for his fellow man. He loved the 'common folk' and was touched with the feelings of their infirmities. The 'common folk' loved him and believed him to be sincere and transparent in all of his relations with them. One of the outstanding elements of greatness in this man was the natural and beautiful simplicity of his life. He lived the simple life; he cared nothing for the tinsel and veneer of the shallow social functions; he shrank from the court dress; he had no sympathy with the dilettante spirit of the age; he abhorred the make-up and the unreal. The great honor that his State and Nation conferred upon him did not inflate him with pride and vainglory. There was nothing ostentatious about him, his very gentleness made him great in the eyes of his admirers.

"Mr. SULLOWAY was a man of tremendously strong convictions, and sometimes he was not overcareful to use the most elegant language to express his convictions. He spoke in no polished phrases; he had a style of delivery all his own; he was simply inimitable in his rugged phraseology. He had native wit and satire, and, with his dynamic personality, he poured into his audience an irresistible logic that won for him many loyal supporters. But though a man of strong convictions, which led him at times to make wounds in the ranks of his political opponents, he was nevertheless big enough to fight fair; he was never revengeful nor unforgiving; he could be as tender as a babe and as forgiving as a mother's kiss.

"Mr. SULLOWAY was very human. He was subject to like passions as we. He doubtless made many mistakes, and who has not? He may not always have lived up to his ideals—neither have his critics lived up to theirs, unless their ideals are lower than we think they are. He has been misrepresented and libeled, and his shortcomings have been grossly exaggerated by unkind and ungracious people, who do not seem to be possessed of that love that thinketh no evil and that covereth a multitude of sins. In this they differ from the great man we eulogize today.

"He was always ready to throw the mantle of charity over the mistakes and shortcomings of his fellow men. I spak now from the viewpoint of one who has had an intimate acquaintance with him for a number of years. I have shared his hospitality and he has shared mine. I have slept in his bed and he has slept in mine. I have had quiet talks with him and I have looked through the windows of his soul, and I can say, without any reservation, that during all my acquaintance with him I have never heard him utter an unkind or an uncharitable word about anyone. He had a heart as tender as the heart of a child; his sympathy for the wayward and the prodigal was most beautiful; his purse strings were always open to the needy, and with the material help rendered was spoken the word of cheer and encouragement.

"I have seldom seen deeper springs of tenderness in any human being than in the great soul of our late Congressman.

"In the words of the poet, we voice our feelings:

"Now the laborer's task is o'er,
Now the battle day is past,
Now upon the farther shore
Lands the voyager at last.
Father, in Thy gracious keeping,
Leave we here our brother, sleeping.

"There the tears of earth are dried,
There its hidden things are clear,
There the work of earth is tried
By a juster Judge than here.
Father, in Thy gracious keeping,
Leave we here our brother, sleeping.

* * * * *

"Lay him gently down to rest,
Folded hands o'er tranquil breast,
Leave him there and do not weep,
He was weary, let him sleep.

"The sympathy of the entire Nation goes out to his bereaved daughter, who was his idol and inspiration. May the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort, who comforteth us all in our tribulation, comfort her in this hour of her sorrow as she sits in the shadow of a great affliction. May the sweet memories of the loved father and the sympathy of thousands of friends, and the mute eloquence of these beautiful flowers and the consolation of the gospel of God's dear Son all bring to her, to-day, messages of hope, and may the peace of God that passeth all understanding keep her heart and mind, through Christ Jesus."

I wish to incorporate as a part of my remarks and to read the following poem written by a friend of the deceased:

IN MEMORIAM.
TO THE HON. CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY.

"Veteran statesman of the hills!
Merrimack's tallest 'pine'!
New Hampshire bows in grief
Before death's bitter shrine.

"His service has been great,
His willingness, still more;
His influence was felt,
We know, from shore to shore.

"His feet pursued the paths
Of greatest good to man;
His precepts were to do
Each day the best you can.

"He towered high in form,
And battled without fear;
Within, his heart beat warm
In lending aid and cheer.

"We mourn our loss to-day;
The triumphs he has won
Will live in memory, still,
Although his work is done.

"Ye statesmen of the hills!
Ye rulers of our land!
Ye now miss in him
A strong and powerful hand.

"The light he shed still shines
Upon our paths to-day,
And, just across the borderland,
We'll greet thee, Sulloway."

—F. EDGAR BUXTON.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. WASON). He has spoken of Mr. SULLOWAY'S position in his native State, and of his service for public welfare there and in Congress. The period covered by the life and active public service of our deceased colleague is the most important period in the history of the Republic since the achievement of our independence, followed in the fullness of time by the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. Mr. SULLOWAY came here well equipped for his service in the National House of Representatives. He was efficient in the great struggle for the preservation of the Union, and efficient under the leadership of Lincoln in helping to mold public sentiment so that the Union was preserved, by force as well as by statesmanship, and then in a short time those who attempted to establish the Confederacy and those who preserved the Union were brought together again. Mr. SULLOWAY had courage in time of war, when force had to be resorted to, and courage after the war, courage as a Member of the House of Representatives.

Ability crossed on cowardice is a curse. Ability crossed on courage is magnificent.

The great majority of the people of the United States are in favor of a representative government, like ours, which gives time for thought, for information, for the cooling of passion, for safeguard against disruption by hasty and ill-considered revolution. Sometimes we boast that our Government more readily registers a change of public opinion than any other Government. That is not the case. Under our Government the Executive is chosen for four years, and is clothed with great power. Only by a two-thirds majority can we overrule the veto, and while in off years there may be a political revolution resulting in a change, temporary or permanent, in public opinion as registered at the ballot box, yet there can be no immediate change of policy unless the Congress by a two-thirds vote in House and Senate can overrule the veto, and legislate notwithstanding the objections of the President. In Great Britain, which in many respects is more purely a democracy than is the United States, I believe they have had three changes of government since the commencement of this great war. France, I think, has had four or five. Italy has had, I do not recall how many, but two or three.

There is a more ready obedience to the weathervane of public opinion in Italy, France, and Great Britain than there is in the United States. Here a longer time is given to see whether a change of public opinion is real and permanent. In the meantime the guaranty of the Constitution, like the grace of God, covers every citizen of the Republic.

In time of war under the Constitution of the United States the Executive is clothed with what we call the war powers exercised by him under the Constitution. It will be recollected that during the four years' struggle for the preservation of the Union those who sought to form a Confederacy were substantially united, and those who were responsible for the election of Abraham Lincoln were divided, about two-thirds for the use of force and about one-third against it.

Abraham Lincoln the day the war began, or the first year and a part of the second year, might have said, as a war measure, "If you do not return to your allegiance to the Government I will, on the first day of January, 1863, as a war measure under the Constitution, free the slaves."

But he did not do that. He wanted to preserve the Union. He took an oath to preserve the Union under the Constitution with slavery or without slavery, but to preserve the Union.

Now the proclamation to free the slaves without legislation would not have been worth the paper upon which it was written had it not been that it had to be made good by force, and thank God it was made good, and I thank God in my old age that I have lived long enough to see but one sentiment between those who supported Lincoln and those who supported the Confederacy and their descendants to-day; we all thank God that under the leadership of that great President, that great man, when all the balance of us are forgotten, will stand through the milleniums as perhaps the greatest statesman that the world ever produced.

In this period of the war we have an Executive. He will be our President until the 4 h day of March, 1921, with such a war as we have and are participating in never before, so far as I know, equaled in the history of the world.

It is a source of satisfaction to me that the Congress, the Senate and the House, chosen by the people by direct vote, this body being chosen every two years and one-third of the other body chosen every two years, that substantially there is no center aisle—Republicans here and Democrats there. We are as a unit in this great struggle.

Public opinion we must pay attention to. Many men of many minds require patience, information, patriotism in a government of the people in the United States, and in the fullness of time in the civilized countries of the world. We are patient. We may make mis akes. The Executive may make mistakes. There are some people who believe that he has made mistakes and yet it would require two-thirds of the people to reverse the engine. I pray God that long before that time comes, if ever it comes, under his leadership, supported by the Congress of the United States, this great war may come to an end by the overthrow of that great autocracy so efficient and so powerful which in my judgment seeks to dominate the world.

I not only respected Mr. SULLOWAY, but I loved him. I was closely associated with him during stormy contests about policies. He was a great big man physically, a great big man mentally, a great big man patriotically, and there was no place where you could discover the white feather—honest in his convictions, courteous in maintaining them. He was always true to himself, true to the people whom he represented, and true to the best interests of the Republic. The end has come to many during the present session of this Congress. Seven Senators, I believe, and about the same number of Members of the House have crossed over. How many more of us will cross over before this war closes I know not. The average life of a generation is less than 40 years. We speculate—some do not because they have great faith—as to the future; orthodox or heterodox, we do not agree entirely as to what is to become of us after we cross over.

No two men ever worship the same God, because God to each individual is according to his conception of God. Yet ours is the Christian religion, and the great mass of the people believe in the Christian religion. Some of us perhaps are not orthodox from some standpoint. Some are Unitarians, some believe in the Trinity, some have faith about this, that, and the other, differing but yet substantially all charitable, thank God, and under our Constitution religious liberty is guaranteed. When I was a younger man I read a volume or two of Swedenborg—The Divine Love and Wisdom. He was a great man. He thought that after we departed this life we found the place which, under universal law, was most agreeable to us. He recorded, in substance, "It was given to me to be caught up to the spiritual heaven, and I saw one who was accounted a saint on earth who, having died, demanded entrance into Heaven; and the reply came that Heaven was not denied to anyone, but on entering he fell down headlong." He got to that zone, so to speak, where he found the people with whom he agreed.

Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad when the time comes for me to cross over if I can find the place where I shall dwell in eternity where Mr. SULLOWAY is to be found, and those of his kind. While our friend, Mr. WASON, was talking a short time ago, I made a few notes, and if I were to follow them clear through I would keep you here all of the afternoon. I shall close by saying may New Hampshire, one of the thirteen colonies that helped to achieve our independence, that produced her Websters, her Gallingers, her Chandlers, her Hales, her Sulloways—may she always remain true as she has been true heretofore to the Republic. Her contributions to the Republic have been great, and one of the contributors, and not the least, to this greatness was our late colleague, Mr. SULLOWAY.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, some 5,447 Congressmen have had voices and votes in this historic chamber during the past 50 years. Of this number only 22 served 20 years and over, and 8 more will have served 20 years at the end of this Sixty-fifth Congress.

In this remarkable group of long-service Members, serving 20 years and over, our departed friend, CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY, ranks among the first in point of efficient service and patriotic achievement. As chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions in seven Congresses, or 14 years, as financial guardian of the veterans of the Civil War, Mr. SULLOWAY carried out in letter and spirit the patriotic utterance of President Lincoln in his last inaugural address, caring for those who in that awful crisis bore the brunt of battle in a four-year war, and their widows and orphans. Hence "CY" SULLOWAY was regarded a revered benefactor and his name was a household word of affection and gratitude in every war-stricken home in the entire country.

While it may be true that length of service in the Congress may not be the exclusive gauge of merit or ability, the standard of estimate is true when the beneficiary has held his high place by fidelity to the best ideals and in patriotic achievement. Apply this test to CYRUS SULLOWAY, and his record of achievement places him among the most meritorious of all that array of Congressmen who have lived official lives in this Chamber during the past half century.

And it is a mooted question, whether one-half of all the 5,447 Members of Congress, who served on this floor during the past half century, did not leave Congress with less valid reputation than when they entered this often called Hall of Fame. That congressional life plays havoc with many untoward and ill-grounded ambitions is forcibly illustrated in the following tragic record:

Of the 391 Members of Congress who took the oath of office in first session of the Sixty-second Congress, 1911, only four belonged to the House in 1891, or 20 years previous—JOSEPH G. CANNON of Illinois, Sereno E. Payne of New York, Henry H. Bingham of Pennsylvania, and John Dalzell of Pennsylvania.

That accomplished scholar and profound student of American history, Dr. Elva Stanwood Alexander, LL.D., in a valuable book issued in 1916, discussing the often too frequent changes in membership in Congress says: "The House, like the heathen goddess, devours its own children. The rapidity with which the process goes on is a bit startling. The average length of a Member is less than six years."

Although New Hampshire, the birthplace and home of "CY" SULLOWAY, is one of the smallest States in the Union in area and population, ranking as the fortieth in population, it has furnished many distinguished statesmen and scholars to our honor roll, notably Daniel Webster and William E. Chandler, and one of the most pathetic and musical gems of poetic literature in the English language was written and sung by a soldier of New Hampshire, Arthur Kittredge, of Reeds Ferry. He wrote and sung "Tenting To-night on the Old Camp Ground," and one of my earliest memories of impulsive enthusiasm was in 1845, when I heard as a barefooted boy, in the open air, one starlit August night the famous Hutchinson family of New Hampshire sing to the accompaniment of the bells, the songs of emancipation. Sixteen years later the same family sang the songs of the Civil War, amid the enthusiastic plaudits of the Boys in Blue, around the gleaming bivouac fires in the camps of the Army of the Potomac.

The political career of "CY" SULLOWAY is rarely exceptional. His whole career was marked by fidelity to duty and courageous honesty. Let not this occasion pass without gathering a lesson of value to the living, especially to the young men of to-day who, like our departed friend in his youth, are struggling against what seems adverse fate.

The brightest gleam of hope for the young man of to-day is in the knowledge that the greatest statesmen who have ever shone in the high places of influence and power in this Republic were born poor and with limited opportunities for education.

On this sacred Sabbath day, in this historic Chamber, let us consecrate ourselves to that fervent and all-absorbing patriotism, that high purpose to serve the people we are honored to represent, with the fidelity which characterized our departed friend—a colleague whose friendship added to our joy of living, and whose career gives us cheerful hopes for the best ideals of popular government.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, one of the saddest features of our life, no matter where it is cast, is the constant breaking up of friendships. Wherever we dwell, that is inevitable It comes from death, it comes from change of residence, from change of habit, sometimes from violent differences of opinion, but I think of no place where a man's lot could be cast where that happens more incessantly than it does to one who is long a Member in this House. The constant change of membership from session to session is forever interrupting our friendships and breaking off intimacies which have contributed greatly to our happiness. When Mr. SULLOWAY first came to Congress I was here. Yet to-day there are only a half dozen who were here then. During that time how many hundreds of men have come here and passed on, with whom I have made acquaintance, even intimate and enjoyable friendships.

I could not enumerate. Many men came for one term only, many for only two and there are very few whose own will unites with the will of their constituents to make this their permanent occupation, though I think that tendency is growing. When I first came here the sessions of Congress did not occupy, on the average, half the year and a Member expected to carry on also his private business. Now it absorbs practically all one's time with the result that it has become more a permanent and engrossing profession. I remember well, as any one would, Mr. SULLOWAY'S first appearance here, for he was a man whom to see was to remember. I suspect any one in the gallery looking down upon the floor of the House would always point him out as one of the few men about whom curiosity would be excited. His prodigious height, his great bulk of body, his unconventional appearance, attracted attention and made of him a marked man. And this extraordinary appearance did not mislead, because he was an extraordinary man.

I can not pretend that I was ever one of his intimates, although we were here together for 20 years, but it did not happen that our congressional lives ran at all in the same channel. You know our intimacies here are apt to be formed through committee work or from interests along the same lines or from the accidents of social life. It was, I presume by chance, that Mr. SULLOWAY'S appointment to a certain committee led him to that line of work where he became so eminent and so useful, and which I think was so in accord with his whole disposition, because that great frame and body of his held a great heart. He was full of human sympathy, and the committee on which he served was one which constantly appealed to that very element in a man's life, for it was his duty to constantly read over the appeals, and the history of men who had volunteered to risk their life for their country, and going back into civil life had suffered hardships and illnesses which brought their needs before his committee.

He had to study these accounts of human suffering which would appeal to anyone, but which particularly would appeal to one of his warm and sympathetic disposition. So it seems to me his life here by the accident of committee appointment was spent largely along just the lines that he would gladly have originally selected. It was spent in giving relief to human suffering, in rendering justice to the men who had risked their all for their country, and in that way his whole career was a constant benediction to his fellow men. He was a man who was singularly modest and retiring in his conduct on this floor because it was very seldom that he participated actively in the debates of Congress.

It was through no lack of ability, because when he did take a part he did it with a vigor and a power which always attracted attention and appreciation. They say great bodies move slowly, and it was perhaps on that account that he seemed somewhat lethargic and slow in taking part in congressional activity; or perhaps it was because of the native modesty of the man. He never put himself forward. It was our misfortune that he did not more often exercise that great power of speech which he possessed, and which, when he did display it, always attracted an admiring audience. But I presume he felt as a great majority of men in the House feel, that their line of work runs along the line of their committee duties, and his committee work chanced to be of a kind which did not call upon him for debate, but did call upon him for constant, assiduous, industrious labor in the committee.

It was in that way, it seems to me, that he contributed most to the efficiency of Congress; not by any parade, not even by the display of qualities which we should have liked to see oftener, but by quiet, modest, indefatigable labor in giving to the retired soldiers of the United States that care and attention and benefaction which he so deeply felt they deserved. He was a man of most decided and unswerving and outspoken convictions, one whom you could always depend on to do his duty, and who would never attempt to shirk or dodge. Indeed he had a courageous and outspoken scorn for the trimmer. No man could serve with him without feeling the warm heart, the depth of sympathy, the generosity of temperament which characterized his whole career here, and those of us who served with him lament, in his departure from us, a warm-blooded friend and a most useful public servant.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when I first came to Congress at the commencement of the first session of the Fifty-eighth Congress I first met the Hon. CYRUS A. SULLOWAY, who was then the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I was appointed a member of that committee, and during all of my service, and all of his service, down to the date of his death, I served with him on that committee. I thus came to know him well and we became the best of friends. I had the highest regard for his many good qualities of head and heart. There was not a particle of affectation or pretense about him. He always stood foursquare to the world. He was honest and sincere himself and had little patience with anyone who was not so.

He was a friend of truth, of soul sincere;
In action faithful, and in honor clear;
Who broke no promises, served no private ends,
Sought no title and forsook no friends.

One always knew exactly where to find him. He talked little, but always to the point, and there was no misunderstanding as to his position on any question on which he expressed himself. If all Members of the Congress were like him in that respect it would take much less time in which to transact the necessary business. I think he had the respect of every Member of the House, and his sudden death was a distinct shock, especially to those who knew him best. He was preeminently the soldier's friend, and the old soldiers of the Civil War, their widows, and orphans never had a better or truer friend in Congress than Uncle CY. SULLOWAY. In season and out of season he labored in their behalf. He firmly believed that the country owed a debt of gratitude for the services of the old veterans for which they could never be fully compensated, and that the least the country could do for them was to see that none suffered in their old age for the necessaries and ordinary comforts of life.

In the granting of pensions he was impatient of fixed rules, and believed and insisted that every case coming before his committee should be acted upon according to its merits, in which the service rendered and the needs of the proposed beneficiary should be the governing factors. Mr. SULLOWAY was a giant in stature and his heart was as great in proportion. A kinder-hearted man never lived. His name will be held in kindest remembrance so long as an old soldier of the Civil War lives, and by his host of warm, personal friends who from intimate acquaintance learned to admire and appreciate him for his many good qualities and kindly acts.

If stores of dry and learned lore we gain,
We keep them in the memory of the brain.
Names, things, and facts, whate'er we knowledge call,
There is the common ledger for them all.
And images on this cold surface traced
Make slight impressions and are soon effaced.
But we've a page more glowing and bright,
Whereon our friendships and our loves to write,
That these may never from the soul depart,
We trust them to the memory of the heart.
There is no dimming, no effacement there;
Each new pulsation keeps the record clear.
Warm, golden letters all the tablets fill,
Nor lose their luster till the heart stands still.

The grim reaper has been unusually busy with the Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and that fact brings us all to the realization that life is fast fleeting away, and as the shadows lengthen we find that we are—

A little more tired at close of day,
A little less anxious to have our way;
A little less ready to scold and blame,
A little more care of a brother's name;
And so we are nearing the journey's end,
Where time and eternity meet and blend.

A little more love for the friends of youth;
A little less zeal for established truth;
A little more charity in our views,
A little less thirst for the daily news;
And so we are folding our tents away,
And passing in silence at close of day.

A little less care for bonds and gold,
A little more zest in the days of old;
A broader view and a saner mind,
A little more love for all mankind;
And so we are faring adown the way
That leads to the gates of a better day.

A little more leisure to sit and dream,
A little more real the things unseen;
A little nearer to those ahead,
With visions of those long loved and dead;
And so we are going, where all must go,
To the place the living may never know.

Mr. SULLOWAY was an intensely patriotic man in the best and truest sense of the word. He loved this country and was proud of its achievements, in the past, and gloried in its growth and prosperity, and its consistent stand for the liberties of all mankind. If he were alive to-day, there is no shadow of doubt as to where he would stand on the great war in which the country is now engaged. He hated with all the earnestness of his strong nature all manner of despotic or autocratic government, and the administration, regardless of party politics, would have had in him a strong supporter of all measures calculated to bring victory to our cause and lasting defeat to the central powers in their attempt to rule the world by frightfulness and brute force. Just before we entered the war, his voice was stilled in death, but if men do live after what we call death, as I believe they do, his spirit is watching the great conflict, supremely confident that the outcome can only be the final end of autocratic government on earth and the eternal victory of right, justice, and free government among men. Wherever his spirit is to-day, I know that he cordially joins with all patriotic Americans in the sentiment expressed by the poet:

Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!

We know what Master laid thy keel,
What workmen wrought thy ribs of steel,
Who made each mast, and sail, and rope,
What anvils rang, what hammers beat,
In what a forge and what a heat
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope!

Fear not each sudden sound and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale!
In spite of rock and tempest roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!
Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
Our hearts our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee—are all with thee!

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I first met Mr. SULLOWAY on the day of the organization of the Sixty-first Congress, when I stood near him before the Speaker's desk waiting to be sworn in as a member. His massive form was so striking and impressive that it arrested the attention of new members like myself and I shall never forget the impression it made upon me. He had then been in Congress 12 years and, although of modest mien and unpretentious, I naturally looked upon him not only as a physical giant, but as a wise counselor, both in experience and mental equipment. Subsequently, I learned by association that my first impressions were correct and that his sage-like appearance indicated the real man in him. His cordial handclasp on introduction won me at once and I ever afterwards in his presence felt a glow of friendly admiration. He seemed to me, in character and manliness, like the sturdy granite of his native State, and his friendship certainly proved of that type to me.

Coming over to where I was sitting a few days after the House was organized, but before the standing committees were announced, he remarked: "I see you wear the G. A. R. button and hope you will be put on the Invalid Pensions Committee. We need you." It turned out as he suggested and I had two years of pleasant service on that committee with Mr. SULLOWAY as chairman.

I learned from him his modest but effective method of dealing with pension legislation, particularly special bills to grant or increase individual pensions, and, as a result, when the score of that Congress closed I had secured more special acts for deserving soldiers of my district than any other Member of the House, not excepting Chairman SULLOWAY himself, and when I called to bid him good-by and thank him for the interest he had taken in me as a new Member, he good-naturedly congratulated me on my success, saying I had been one of the aptest students he had ever known along that line, and that my soldier constituents ought to be gratified at the work I had done for them. So they were, but they did not know how much of my success I owed to the friendly advice and assistance of my good mentor and friend, Mr. SULLOWAY.

I never expected to see him again. A slip, in the nature of a Democratic landslide, at the election in 1910, had left me out of the Sixty-second Congress and, being of the Middle West, and Mr. SULLOWAY of New England, our paths were not likely to again cross each other. A decided political jolt in 1912 also left both of use out of the Sixty-third Congress and our separation seemed final, but, at the election in 1914, the wave of political unrest having begun to recede, we were both reelected and came back to the Sixty-fourth Congress to renew a friendship which was to continue steadfast and cordial until the Angel of Death touched him, and he was called to his reward.

Naturally, therefore, I can not let this opportunity pass without placing upon his bier one little chaplet of love and remembrance.

Others, like his former colleague [Mr. WASON], who knew him in his home life, knew him where State honors and local distinctions were his, knew him before he came to Washington, and were more fortunate than I in long association with him in youth and in the maturity of manhood, have spoken at length of his virtues, his lovable character, his broad humanity and universal love of his fellow men, coupled with lofty patriotism and love of country, and each and every sentence and thought expressed, or which may be expressed on this occasion, has and will find in my own heart an echo and an abiding place. He was to me an ideal manly man, sincere and true. As a Member of the House he was able and active, although his seeming modesty in speech kept him from seeking to enter the so-called charmed circle of the "talking few."

Perhaps his most distinguishing characteristic was his intense loyalty and absolute love of justice and fair dealing. He was incapable of wronging any man, friend or foe. His loyalty to country during the Civil War led him early to seek service in the Union Army, but his physical condition was such at that time and during the war that this privilege was denied him, but this very denial seems to have made him more thoughtful of those in the service, and I am told he devoted his time and energies during the war largely to civic duties connected therewith, demonstrating the fact that in war there are civic heroes as well as military heroes, each deserving the highest commendation of their fellow countrymen. After the war his interest and friendship for the "boys in blue" continued, and, it is said, grew stronger and stronger as their years and increasing infirmities rendered them more and more proper objects of bounty from the great Government they had saved from destruction. So marked was this trait in his character that long before I knew him he had become known from one end of the country to the other in Grand Army circles as "CY. SULLOWAY, the soldiers' friend."

As a legislator in pension matters, he did not believe in the trivial technicalities which often bar needy soldiers and their dependents from receiving just assistance. He was old enough to remember the recruiting promise of every recruiting officer sent out by the Government in the sixties, that no volunteer soldier or his family should ever be permitted by the Government to come to want, and this promise in Mr. SULLOWAY's mind was a continuing obligation as binding as if written into the statutes like the present war relief measures. His big heart was also big enough to occasionally overlook in the Army records boyish delinquencies where no treasonable act or moral turpitude was involved, such as overstaying a leave of absence or being marked a deserter by mistake. As chairman and member of the Invalid Pensions Committee he acted upon this theory, and often a needy but deserving soldier wondered, as he thought of some small blot on his Army record, just how his bill happened to get through the committee, while one not so needy, or possibly not so deserving, comfortably fixed in this world, wondered at his own failure to receive as much as he thought the Government owed him. But SULLOWAY knew. His intuition was keen, and he readily recognized the difference between need and greed. He remembered the recruiting promise of the Government to care for the needy soldier, his widow and orphans, and in doing this his big heart and just mind led him at times to cut out the red tape sacredness of Army records often made up by an incompetent company sergeant or minor official. In this he showed a nobility of soul too rare in the public life of to-day; a justness of comprehension too often criticised by small minds. He was a friend of God's poor, and as such left many footprints on the sands of time. Requiescat in pace.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I shall take the time of the House now to say only a word or two. When I came to the House nearly 14 years ago I met Mr. Sulloway and was very much struck with his appearance when I first met him. I was fortunate enough after that time to live with him in the same hotel for a considerable period of time. I came to know him well. I never in my life have seen a man of such magnificent stature and such great brain power who was so meek and mild and almost childlike in his affections and friendships. I had occasion to know Mr. Sulloway, because I talked with him a great deal, and I regarded him as a man of wonderful ability. Yet he was the most unostentatious, modest man I think I ever knew. When his death was announced I felt that I had lost, and I had lost, a personal friend.

When I first came to Congress I represented 19 counties in the State of Florida, most of them lying along the eastern coast of the State, populated very largely by Federal soldiers and their widows. This, of necessity, involved me in a good deal of pension work. On every occasion when I went to Mr. Sulloway I found him sympathetic and kind, and he always gave me the assistance that I needed. As a new Member of Congress, I relied upon him absolutely in all pension matters and frequently sought his advice in other matters and he never failed me. He was a great man, and I say that with due consideration. Since I have been here I have seen many great men in this House—men of broad vision, men of great intellect, men of wonderful accomplishments. Mr. Sulloway easily ranked with those men, in my judgment. When he died a giant fell. Not only New Hampshire, but the Nation was the loser by his death. I grew not only to admire him, but to feel a very close affection for him. This House is one place where the measure of a man is not only soon taken, but it is accurately taken. Mr. Sulloway's measure was taken and he occupied a high place in the estimation of his colleagues. He was high-minded, noble, and true, and not only New Hampshire, but the Republic was made poorer when he left us. God bless his memory.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, brief shall be my uttered thoughts in contemplating the life, career, and death of this eminent New Englander with whom I met some time after coming to Congress. Several who have paid their tributes told of meeting Representative SULLOWAY when they first came to Congress. I saw him, but met him considerably later. His personality attracted me. Standing here among his fellows as one of the proud Lebanon cedars, I sought not to touch the form; but long before the conclusion of my first term I sat within the shade of this giant tree, and enjoyed the fruits of companionship that arose between the mountaineer of New England, old in statesmanship, and the young man of the plains, just entering the service.

There have been some very interesting remarks of a personal character this afternoon, more than are usual on such occasions. Statistics have been resorted to on this particular occasion more than on others. Perhaps it is because of the greater necrology of this Congress. Many have passed away and the term has little more than half elapsed.

In thinking of the number who have gone over, one fact has been overlooked by those of longer service. I am reminded of it by what has been said by every speaker to-day referring to the prominence of Mr. SULLOWAY in his service on behalf of the Civil War soldier. Of the 435 Members of this body, old or young in service, where once perhaps two-thirds of the membership had worn in battle time the blue or the gray, to-day there are but five who met in battle more than 50 years ago. At the head of those who wore the blue is Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, who has passed his fourscore years and still is, like SULLOWAY was, a giant. Well might we say of the men who lived and legislated 20 years ago, as was said of old, "There were giants in those days." By his side is the other Member from Ohio, Gen. HOLLINGSWORTH. Added to that number, I believe, there is but one more, Mr. OSBORNE, of California. Of those who struck for the then projected nation there are but two, Maj. STEDMAN, of North Carolina, and Gen. ESTOPINAL, of Louisiana, or five in all. There is another important statistical fact, showing how brief is this life and how little control we have over it. Here is the greatest law-making body on earth, the most ingenious contrivance for legislation in the world. Here we come nearer expressing the will of the greatest and most intelligent people on earth, and yet how absolutely helpless are we against the decrees which are constantly calling us away. "Death's hand no man can stay," and Congress and Parliament are composed of men.

It is a thought which should be expressed that our friend SULLOWAY died not yesterday, not last month, but nearly 14 months ago. But notwithstanding the lapse of time there are those among us who formed friendships with him that have impelled us to come here and pay our tributes, although many men consigned to their tombs are forgotten before a dozen suns have rolled. It is an especial tribute that old Members of this House and others have come and sat through these two hours and listened to the observations that have been made upon the life, character, and well-deserved fame of Mr. SULLOWAY.

He was a man of courage, a man of conviction, advocated fearlessly his cause, and never forsook a friend. Thus several times has it been remarked that he seldom spoke. Yet all who knew him recognized his commanding ability with juries, on the stump, and here in this Hall. In debate he had a lion's strength, but like the lion, he seldom exerted the lion's strength. He was not, like some great New Hampshire men, born in that State, educated in the Granite State, who went elsewhere for their careers. He was born there; he lived there; he rose in stature physically, professionally, and politically as Mount Washington rises above its fellows in the range. For the brief time he was absent from this Hall, when the membership looked about for the New Hampshire men it was said that the White Mountains were here, but Mount Washington was absent.

Telemachus said, "It is ever wrong to say that a good man dies." I will follow that rule by simply saying that the New Englander has passed. His life, of course, is passed, but, in common with all humanity, his deeds will live as deeds of all mankind will survive, as influences and causes for good or ill. In his case, I believe, in the family of which he was a part, in the community in which he resided, in the State which he honored, and the Nation which he served, his acts and counsel were all for the good. They will be preserved through the years and decades. New Hampshire granite has been transported to every State in this Union. Shafts of its enduring quality stand at the head of the graves in every State of the Union and every country on the continent. Upon those shafts there may be inscribed epitaphs embodying the inspiration of the poet and the wisdom of the greatest philosophers and sages, but I believe that deeper in American hearts and memories there will be the enduring deeds of CYRUS SULLOWAY than can be traced on these granite shafts.

A story once I read like this:

"I wrote my name upon the sands. When I returned the flood and ebbing tides had wiped out every trace that I had made. I then carved it upon the enduring granite. Years thereafter I returned to find that a lightning bolt had destroyed that granite shaft. Then I traced it upon enduring bronze. Years thereafter I returned. An earthquake had rent the base of that bronze and it lay buried under drifting dust and sand. I learned the lesson that if I would write my name where it would endure I would write it upon the hearts of men."

So, instead of on granite shaft or bronze monument, CYRUS SULLOWAY has his name written upon the hearts and memories of his fellow men. From New England to Florida, from Florida to California, wherever Grand Army of the Republic members are, and wherever their widows and orphans survive, his name is known and revered as the soldier's friend.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, we are gathered here to-day in this historic Chamber, the meeting place of the lower branch of the greatest legislative body in the world, to pay tribute to the memory of one who rose from a humble station to a prominent place in this great body, where he served for 20 years with great credit and distinction. He died "in the harness" in the service of his country. In the closing hours of the Sixty-fourth Congress with day and night sessions on March 2 and 3, he contracted a severe cold which developed into pneumonia, and despite the pleading of his colleagues, he refused to leave the Chamber day or night. He said: "There are many bills coming up here in these closing hours that are of national import, a few of them are measures that politically cut both ways. I am going to stay on the job for I am not afraid to meet these questions and I am not going to give anybody a chance to say I was a 'quitter.'"

This was typical of the character of Hon. CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY, Representative in Congress from the First New Hampshire district, from the day, as a young man, he walked barefooted 14 miles from Grafton, N. H., his birthplace, to Franklin, to enter the law office of the late Hon. Austin F. Pike, one of the famous attorneys of New Hampshire of that long ago period. Mr. SULLOWAY was born in Grafton, N. H., on June 8, 1839. He passed away early Sunday morning, March 11, 1917, from pneumonia, after an illness of but a few days. Mr. SULLOWAY's immediate family consisted of one daughter, Miss H. Belle Sulloway, who was with him here in Washington at the time of his sickness and sad death. The wife of Mr. SULLOWAY had died when this daughter was a very young girl. The sympathy, care, and anxiety for his daughter made the home life of Mr. SULLOWAY one of the striking features of his life.

He was admitted to the bar in 1863, and came down from Franklin where he had been studying law and opened an office in Manchester, N. H. He was allowed the use of a desk in the office of Judge David Cross, at that time one of the great leaders of the New Hampshire bar. Mr. SULLOWAY remained in the office for some time until one day, Judge Cross said to him: "Cy, I guess I have got to ask you to move out. I find you are getting some of my best clients away from me. You are able to open an office of your own and you will not have any trouble about getting business." He then went over into the office of Attorney Samuel Lord, a prominent lawyer of Manchester, where he remained until he formed a partnership with E. M. Topliff and the fame of the Sulloway & Topliff firm, with offices in the then new opera block in Manchester, became statewide. Topliff, one of the greatest and most skillful cross-examiners in the history of the New Hampshire bar, and SULLOWAY, forceful, homely in expression, imposing and convincing in argument in "summing up" to the jury, made a "pair that was hard to beat" in the then legal field of the Granite State.

Mr. SULLOWAY early "took to politics" and in 1872, was elected to the State legislature from Manchester. Again in 1887 he was returned to the House of Representatives at Concord, N. H., and he continued to serve there until 1894, when he was nominated for Congress for the first time, at an exciting and enthusiastic convention at The Weirs, with two candidates against him. From that time on he was renominated eleven consecutive times, covering a period of twenty-two years. All but once he was the victor at the polls in November. In 1912 when the Progressive movement was at its height, Mr. SULLOWAY was beaten by Hon. Eugene E. Reed, Democrat, by a few more than a thousand votes, but two years later, Mr. SULLOWAY "came back" and defeated Mr. Reed by a substantial majority, and was reelected to the Sixty-fourth Congress. He was again renominated for the present Sixty-fifth Congress and was reelected over the Democratic candidate, Hon. Gordon Woodbury of Bedford. He served in Congress just a full twenty years, which in later days of his service, was his hope and ambition.

This long period of service attested his strength and loyalty to the people of his district. He had a host of friends that never deserted him. He was faithful and energetic and attended carefully to the interests of his district. He was even more popular in his later days than when he started in office. He grew and developed as a legislator as his career blossomed with age. His six-foot-six and three-quarters inches came to be more and more beloved and honored as time passed. He obtained a record in New Hampshire never before equaled. No man before his day had ever served more than three terms in the lower branch of Congress. Many times his nomination was by acclamation, without an opponent, until he became known as CYRUS "ACCLAMATION" SULLOWAY. When he had opposition his great popularity due to a recognition of the value of the service he was rendering to his country and State, was sufficient to vanquish the hopes of any aspirant to his seat. They all went the same way, down to defeat.

I had long known the "Tall Pine of the Merrimack" as he was so often and so affectionately referred to. I knew of his unique personality and strength in the courts of law; I knew of it in the State legislature where he was a power in the public service; I knew of it in the Congress where he had served so long and faithfully; I knew of it in the field of politics, when I once tried to get his job; I knew of it in the hearts of the people when the votes at the primary had been cast, and I am proud that the people of the first New Hampshire district have seen fit to select me as the successor of one whom they so greatly loved. I am told that he became a great favorite with his fellow Members of Congress, and that he was regarded by them as a diligent and faithful public servant. There never was a word of suspicion spoken of him. He was an uncompromising Republican, a stanch and enthusiastic protectionist, a loyal and true citizen, the friend alike of the rich and the poor. He knew no sect, no creed, and his hand was out to all. His "God bless you," will be widely and sorely missed in Washington and in New Hampshire. His death brought genuine sorrow to the people in State and Nation.

Of his congressional career other Members who served with him here on this floor can speak much better than I. Suffice it to say that I know of his fidelity in looking after the interests of the working people and the industries of our State and country, of his services for the Portsmouth Navy Yard, of the tremendous work he did for the veteran soldiers and their widows and orphans, and the deep interest he had at all times in the welfare of his constituents. I did not always agree with Mr. SULLOWAY, but it is a pleasure for me now to record the fact that our differences were never personal. His great, warm heart made him always a fair and generous opponent as well as a loyal and devoted friend.

In closing I feel that I can say nothing that will so fittingly and adequately express the sentiment of the great body of the people of his own State, whom he so long in part represented on this floor, as to quote an editorial published in the Daily Mirror and American in Manchester, N. H., on Tuesday, March 20, 1917. This editorial was written by Mr. William H. Topping, who had for nearly 20 years served Mr. SULLOWAY as secretary or clerk of his committee here in Washington. I ask leave, Mr. Speaker, to print the editorial referred to as a part of my remarks.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

THE LATE CONGRESSMAN SULLOWAY.

The tribute paid to the late Congressman CYRUS A. SULLOWAY by the citizens of Manchester and New Hampshire was one of the greatest ever given to a citizen of the State. The thousands who gathered at his obsequies attested to the love, the esteem, and the admiration in which he was held. It was a wonderful demonstration to a remarkable man.

Congressman CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY in life was a unique character. His great size made him conspicuous wherever he went, as he towered far above the usual-sized man. But it was not his great stature that made him beloved by people all over the country and the idol of hundreds and thousands of residents of his native State. It was the human side of Mr. SULLOWAY that appealed to his friends. As he was large in stature, he was equally so in his generosity, simplicity, rugged honesty, and plainness. Political honors never swelled his head, and at the close of his 20 years of service he was the same modest, retiring, thoughtful, considerate, and plain man that he was when he first went to Congress 22 years ago.

His public career has been a brilliant one. Without "fuss or feathers" he made his name almost a household word from one end of the country to the other. In the Fifty-sixth Congress he was named as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions by Speaker Henderson. This committee deals with all pension matters growing out of the Civil War. The wonderful work of Chairman SULLOWAY brought this committee from mediocrity to one of the most important in the House. Not only on general but on special legislation Mr. SULLOWAY's great work won for him and his committee the confidence of the House on both the Republican and Democratic sides of the Chamber. Faithful and conscientious work made it possible for this committee to receive, on practically all occasions, the almost unanimous support of the Members of the House.

In the matter of special legislation or private pension bills, Congressman SULLOWAY secured from the Bureau of Pensions one of the most exact and expert examiners in the country, who prepared the cases and briefed the evidence for the committee. Every case acted on was read and considered by the full committee. Unworthy cases seldom, if ever, got by the examiner. In one session of Congress alone more than 1,200 cases, where the soldier was blind, paralyzed, or bedridden, were passed. No such humane work had ever been accomplished by the committee before, and it brought Congressman SULLOWAY into national prominence.

In addition to this, Congressman SULLOWAY succeeded in getting through Congress much general legislation, which increased the pensions of both the soldiers and widows. His work in this line won for him unstinted praise, both from the old soldiers and from the general public. He was not radical in the matter of legislation, all reports to the contrary notwithstanding. He was just, fair, honest, and conscientious in his treatment of matters, both general and special.

On other questions of great public moment Congressman SULLOWAY was a man whose opinions were sought and whose judgment was respected. As a tariff man he was one of the strongest in the House. He was a great student of this subject and a firm believer that the success and prosperity of the business and industrial interests of this country must depend upon protection. He was equally as positive that labor's only guarantee to employment was through the instrumentality of this same tariff. In Congress, at the hustings, and in private conversation he vigorously and originally expressed his views in language that left no misgivings as to its sincerity.

Congressman SULLOWAY accomplished much for his district and his constituents during his long service. One of the monuments to his successful career is the Portsmouth Navy Yard. Unquestionably this yard would have been abandoned but for the tireless energy of the "Tall Pine." The Navy Department was against its continuance, the naval officers were all opposed to it, on account of the fact that the city, where it was located, lacked what they thought were proper social features. When other men from New Hampshire in Congress had grown weary of trying to do something for Portsmouth, Congressman SULLOWAY kept plugging away with that determination that always characterized his efforts, and he succeeded one day, in a speech filled with humor, patriotism, and pathos, in getting an appropriation of $1,000,000 through for the construction of a big, new dry dock, then the largest in the country. That dry dock saved the Portsmouth Yard, and continued efforts, followed by successful legislation, much of which was secured through the efforts of Mr. SULLOWAY, have brought the yard up to its present standard and made it one of the best in the country, and which has insured forever its continuance as such.

Other monuments to Congressman SULLOWAY are public buildings at Dover, Rochester, Laconia, and improvements in the Manchester building. One of the recent acts of the late Congressman was the passage of an appropriation through the House for an extensive addition, in both land and buildings, to the Manchester post office, amounting to $225,000. Liberal appropriations were secured by Mr. SULLOWAY for river and harbor improvements at Newmarket, Dover, and Portsmouth, among them being nearly half a million for the removal of Hendersons Point, which was successfully accomplished.

As a legislator Congressman SULLOWAY was highly regarded in Washington. He won the confidence of men of all parties. Hon. CHAMP CLARK and Senator JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, both formerly violent opponents of pensions at one time in the House, made speeches in which they devoted their entire time to a commendation of the work of Congressman SULLOWAY on pension matters. Both stated that a careful investigation of the efforts of the Manchester man had convinced them of their error, and that as far as they were concerned they were with Mr. SULLOWAY and his committee, and had the utmost confidence in the work they were doing.

The illness and death of Congressman SULLOWAY was attended by genuine sorrow and grief in Washington. His friends were legion in Congress, and great leaders on both sides of the Chamber called at his hotel and eagerly sought news of his condition. His death cast a great gloom over official Washington. A distinguished gathering of Senators and Representatives accompanied his body to this city and paid their last respects.

Manchester turned out and paid him an immense tribute. Rarely, if ever, has there been a more impressive service or a more distinguished gathering of citizens in New Hampshire than was assembled at the bier of the "Tall Pine of the Merrimack." People of all classes and conditions of life were there, for all loved him. This great throng of sad, sorrowful, and mourning citizens and friends of the Hon. CYRUS ADAMS

SULLOWAY answered his critics effectually and sufficiently. It was a wonderful tribute to this plain, rugged, homely man of the people and one that even a king might be proud of.

Of the personal side of Congressman SULLOWAY volumes could be written. His history is one of kind deeds. Tenderness, generosity, sweetness, loyalty, modesty, and honesty characterized his whole existence. He lived to make others happy. Of his mite of this world's goods he gave the larger share to his neighbor. He came out of Congress poorer financially than he entered, but he left behind a record for sterling and rugged honesty, and there never was a blot on his public service, a heritage to him dearer than all the money of the earth. Mr. SULLOWAY was a great student, quite a lover of poetry, especially some of Whittier's selections. He was an ardent reader, a thoughtful student, a conscientious legislator, a noble man, an ardent patriot, a kind and loving father, a man whose friends were legion, because he never lost the old ones and constantly added new. His place in the hearts of the New Hampshire people can never be filled. He occupied a niche of his own. The great man has gone from earth, but memories of his good deeds, his sterling qualities, and his generous ways will live on forever.

Mr. BURROUGHS assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, when I became a Member of the House of Representatives in 1898, having been elected at a special election for the remainder of the term of my predecessor, who had passed away, I first became acquainted with the Hon. CYRUS A. SULLOWAY. He had a distinguished appearance, being of mammoth stature, and I was drawn toward him by his strong and forceful characteristics. My intimacy with him continued during his long service as a Member of this legislative body.

It had generally been the custom in New Hampshire when a Member had served a few terms to change the representation, and I recall that at one convention, at which he did not appear as a contestant for renomination, there was a long discussion in the convention as to who should be nominated. With the multiplicity of candidates the convention could not seem to agree upon a candidate. He sat a silent spectator in the gallery listening to the proceedings, and finally, when the convention could not seem to agree upon anyone else, he was nominated by acclamation, and ever afterwards received the nomination of his party to appear here as a Member of the House.

In the campaign of 1912, owing to a division in the Republican Party, he failed to secure a reelection, although he was honored by the renomination. That was the fate that was meted out to quite a number of the older Members of the House. Mr. SULLOWAY and myself had the same characteristics in one respect, and that was we neither of us deserted the party to which we belonged. He never sought a nomination of any other party than his own. If the Republican Party was not strong enough for him to win in an election he preferred to remain at home.

I became quite intimate with Mr. SULLOWAY from the fact that like himself I wanted to be a soldier in the Civil War, but I had the misfortune to be born lame and that lameness kept me out of the service. He was rejected because the authorities did not think he was physically strong enough to endure the hardships of a soldier's life. I recollect that when the draft system was in effect during the Civil War the people desired to reduce the quota to be drafted as much as possible. They called upon me to go up to the surgeon's office and be exempted from the service; by so doing the quota from my own city would be reduced. My city was then a small one, having barely 12,000 people. Finally I was prevailed on to go before the surgeon in order that I might be legally exempted. It was a task that was exceedingly disagreeable to me. The moment the door of the office was closed the examining surgeon, who had known me from early childhood, said, "There is no need of examining you, you will be at once exempted," and he struck my name from the list. My father was 50 years of age when the war broke out and one of the first to enlist.

I was always very proud of the fact that my father, who then was 50 years of age, was a soldier of the Civil War. I was the only other male member of the family, and consequently there was but one of us who could go, and my father embraced the opportunity. I was nearly 20 years of age when the war began. I was familiar with all of the inducements that were given soldiers, and especially do I recall the first meeting held in the city hall at which we all gathered to see whether people were willing to volunteer as soldiers to preserve the Union. My father was one of the first who signed the roll, a large number following, and I well recollect the assurances that were then given that the family of any man who enlisted would always be cared for, if he gave up his opportunities in life and went into the service for the purpose of preserving the Union. That was very strongly impressed upon the youth of that day. My own State made great provisions for the families of soldiers. It does to-day contribute to the burial of every soldier and pays to the soldiers' widows additional compensation besides the pension they receive, in order that they shall not be deprived of necessities, and the State of Massachusetts makes special provision for the care of families where the husbands or sons enlist or are drafted into the service in the present world-wide war.

When I became a Member of this House Mr. SULLOWAY was prominent on the Committee on Invalid Pensions. He subsequently became chairman of that committee by reason of his long service. I admired the man in every feature of his life. I have been told by those who have been connected with the measurement of men that no two men measure alike, that there is always some feature that makes each man different from the other. Notwithstanding this confident statement it was my fortune to have some men serve in this body with me who were taken for me and I for them. I have frequently been taken for Gen. HOLLINGSWORTH, and he says that he has frequently been taken for me. But there is one particular mark that has always served as a distinction personal to myself. One night when going down town in my own city to attend a banquet I passed by a man in the evening and the shadow of the trees would prevent one from being known generally, and he said as he passed, "By gracious, isn't that Billy Greene?" I said "Yes," and he said, "I went to school with you 60 years ago, and knew you the moment I saw you step." I talked with him awhile, I knew him well as a boy. When I went to the banquet that night the man who presided at the banquet saw fit in introducing me to the company, all of whom I knew, to say that he happened to be in the gallery of the House of Representatives a short time ago, and that it was astounding to him that so many people in the gallery knew who I was; he said I was almost as well known in Washington as I was in Fall River.

In a little time after this episode when I was called upon to make some remarks, I said to them that I could tell them why I was known in Washington as well as at home. I told them that it was because I had a gait that no man can imitate, and when people sat in the gallery and saw me walk up and down the aisle it is natural for them to say, "Who is that lame fellow going along there?" And they are told it is Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That lameness has probably given me a wider acquaintance than I could have obtained in any other way. I rarely go into a strange city that I do not find some one who knows me by reason of the original step that I have. I have never regarded it as a misfortune, as some people do. Mr. SULLOWAY was noted in an assembly because of his stature, and I because of my lameness.

Mr. SULLOWAY and myself were very much alike, for both of us looked at the hopeful side of life; we never looked on the shadowy side, neither of us ever thought of the shadows, but more of the pleasures that life affords. I realized that he desired to do whatever he could for the benefit of his fellow men. The record that has been given here to-day by those who have spoken so generously of him is a record of which every person might well feel proud.

He was a man who was upright in character, firm in opinion, and he had a reason for everything he did. He was original in his expressions. I had not thought of his being a member of the legislature of the State of New Hampshire, and was glad to hear the remarks made here to-day in respect to his long service in his native State, and of the work that he did there. I saw him just before the close of the session of the Sixty-fourth Congress sitting in his seat. He then had quite a severe cold, and I admonished him that I thought he ought not to be in the House. I shook his hand, and felt the fever that was running through his veins, and I said to him, "Brother SULLOWAY, you ought to go home, you ought to go to bed that is the best place for a man who is sick—go to bed and keep out of this chilly wind and blast." That was on the last day of the session, as we were forming to go into the Senate to participate in the ceremonies of the second inauguration of President Wilson. Only a few days later, one short week, he was gone.

The Speaker appointed me a member of the committee to attend his funeral, and I never shall forget the sentiment that seemed to prevail in the city of Manchester, where he lived; the strong feeling displayed by the people there, the warm interest they had in his career, and the solidity of expression with which they appeared to be of one mind in regard to his faithful service. I was very strongly impressed by the sermon which has been alluded to to-day by the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. WASON, which was preached at Mr. SULLOWAY's funeral. I hope Mr. WASON will print, as a part of this service, the whole sermon, for it was certainly the most remarkable sermon I had ever heard preached at the funeral of any person I ever knew.

The preacher said Mr. SULLOWAY was a faithful, consistent, honest protectionist, and that if he were present here to-day this is what he would say. I thought of what has been said sometimes of others, that a man being dead, yet speaketh; and when this preacher, small in stature but powerful in language, proceeded to say what he thought, believed, or knew CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY would have said had he been there to speak for himself, it was a most remarkable tribute. There was no hesitation in the voice of the preacher, no hesitation in the expression, but every word uttered was firm and true like the character of the late Congressman whom he so eloquently eulogized. He spoke well, and it was a wonderful tribute to the memory of a very good man.

The attendance at the funeral was very large. It was a church such as they rarely build now, one of those large churches with extensive galleries; but there was not a seat to be had anywhere in the church. Every seat was filled. Among other organizations present were the letter carriers of the post office. Mr. SULLOWAY was always very active in their behalf, as well as in behalf of the soldiers. The post office was closed as a tribute to his memory, and the letter carriers and other employees of the post office were enabled to be present.

I met there a large number of the prominent people of New Hampshire. They gathered at the funeral exercises. After the conclusion of the ceremonies I was invited to attend a conference, in order that it might be determined what was best to be done under the circumstances as to time of choosing his successor. When I was called upon to speak I said said that, for myself, I usually took the forlorn hope.

They thought that it was a forlorn hope to elect a Republican successor at that time in the year, when the snow was deep on the ground in the southern part of the district. I said that if I were living there I thought I should take the forlorn hope and risk it, but I yielded to the views of the Republicans of New Hampshire. They asked me, "Is it necessary for us to elect a successor to Mr. SULLOWAY in order that the Republicans may control the next House?" I said, "No, we can not control the House even if a Republican were elected to succeed Mr. SULLOWAY; and as you know a great deal more about conditions in New Hampshire than I do, and you think it would not be possible to get the Republicans out to vote who live in the country on account of the snow in the month of March and the practical impassability of the roads, I defer to your judgment." They thought that if they postponed the election until God's sun shone upon the earth and dissipated the snow they would then be able to send a Republican as the successor of Mr. SULLOWAY. I said, "In view of what the gentlemen here say who know, and in view of the fact that there is no necessity for trying to do something that you can not accomplish, I am willing to take your judgment and let the result speak for itself." As you all know, success came to our fortunes when the election was held and Mr. BURROUGHS easily was elected to succeed Mr. SULLOWAY.

Mr. SULLOWAY, in the Committee on Pensions as well as elsewhere, was very conscientious in whatever he did. It has been said that he looked with leniency upon many of the men whose cases were brought before him, because some of them had been put down as deserters undeservedly; and when he believed that to be the fact, he urged that this delinquency be overlooked. I may say that I sympathize a great deal with his idea in regard to that one fact. One of the most unpleasant things I have found in looking up pension legislation is that some good man had been marked as a deserter who was not a deserter, but who when the war was over was told by his commanding officer, "The war is now over. You do not need to wait here, you can go home"; and yet, where soldiers who had no thought of pensions failed to remain to be discharged regularly from the service, quite frequently such men have been marked as deserters, and so have been denied the privileges of the pension laws because the record showed that they deserted from the service. I would be glad to wipe out all those distinctions. I have in mind now the case of a young man who was a member of the Regular Army a few years ago. He was thrown from a horse and badly injured, and was sent to a hospital for treatment, and was allowed to wander away from the hospital.

He went home, but was marked as a deserter, and his record so stands to-day, when he did honorable service, and never should have been allowed to depart from that hospital; but the parties in charge of the hospital felt that by letting him go home and putting the charge of desertion against him it would relieve the United States Treasury of the responsibility which it otherwise would have to bear because of his injury in the service. No such narrow spirit ever characterized the life and character of the late CYRUS A. SULLOWAY, whose memory we hallow to-day. He was broad enough to throw the mantle of charity over every such case that came to his attention.

I have been gratified to listen to the tributes here to Mr. SULLOWAY's memory. Having taken the oath of office here on the 18th day of June, 1898, and having been a Member of the House ever since, it has been very pleasing to me to hear the kind words spoken by his associates.

Allusion was made by my colleague [Mr. GILLETT] to the fact that one of the saddest features of our life here is the passing away of our colleagues. That is very true. It is a very sad feature of life, but there is one compensation in our service here, and that is the extensive acquaintance we obtain and the friendships we form with men throughout the country, and the high character that attends nearly every service here.

The average population of a district is 200,000. It is natural that Representatives selected should be men of high standing, high character, well thought of at home and naturally would be well thought of here because of their average attainments, experience, and ability.

All of us can not become orators. Many of us could take a great deal more time in debate than we do, and so far as my experience is concerned I hear so much talk that I think that if one-half of it were eliminated the country would be a great deal better off. I fear some Members talk too long and too drearily to accomplish what they really seek to do. If Members would talk plainly and drop some of the long flights of eloquence, I believe better results would be obtained.

Mr. SULLOWAY did but little talking, but he could always be found in his seat. I have not examined the record of his attendance, but I think you will find that it will compare favorably with that of any Member of the House. I do not recall that he was absent except on account of sickness during all the time of his service here. He died respected by his fellow men and loved by his associates. The fine tributes to his character that will be recorded will be an honor to his memory, to his State, and to the country.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, when I left the floor I said that I wanted to read a tribute to the former Congressman SULLOWAY by ex-Congressman George C. Hazleton, who represented a district in Wisconsin in this House in the Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses, and who was born in Chester, N. H. This address was delivered at a meeting of the New Hampshire Association in the District of Columbia on May 14, 1917, and is as follows:

"Mr. President and friends, we have assembled here as members of the New Hampshire Association to lay our votive garland upon the new-made grave of CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY and to join our hearts and voices in tribute to his memory. In paying this our tribute to him, we pay it not less to our native State.

"We were bound to him and he to us by a common tie of nativity and by his genial affiliations from time to time with our society.

"We shall never look upon his like again. He was typical of no man but himself—sui generis—the first and last of his dynasty.

"He was of the rugged cast of men in form, feature, and character, a modern Samson in physique, and as he walked the earth he towered above his fellows like some tall peak that surmounts the Sierras.

"When he died the undertakers had to search three cities to find a casket large enough to receive his giant form, attired as when he stood upon the floor of Congress to advocate his favorite cause of the Union soldier.

"He was stricken down from his post of public duty just when our Government was about to enter the arena of international war, and when he was able to render valuable service in the councils of the Nation.

"He was far in advance of any of his contemporaries in the advocacy of State and National preparedness. He believed in the impressive power of a great Navy as a conservator of peace among the nations. As early as 1904, at the dedication of the soldiers' monument in my native town of Chester, where he received an ovation from many veterans of the Union Army, I heard him say, 'Nations are born and nations are extinguished where armed men meet on fields of deadly conflict. I believe,' he said, 'that we should increase our Navy as rapidly as our revenues and shipyards will permit, and the Army to at least 100,000 men.'

"This, as we all know, is not the time or place to elaborate the story of his private or public life, but if you seek a knowledge of the original sources of his development in person and character, you will find them well marked in the romantic regions that enveloped his early life, in the blood of the Anglo-Saxon that coursed in his veins, and in the sentiments, ambitions, and influences which he imbibed from the social system of the New England States.

"He was an ardent lover of nature, and, until his eyelids closed in the sleep of death, he loved and cherished the romantic features of his native State—crystal lakes, mirrors of the skies; her mountain summits diademed with the snows of winter; and her mountain walls draped for half the year with scenes of transcendent beauty and of joy forever. Nor is this all. He was justly proud of her eventful history, civic triumphs, and material progress, and of that popular will that had kept him for more than a quarter of a century in the fields of his fondest ambitions.

"I have heard it said, but I will not vouch for its authenticity, that the younger Tell when traveling with his father, the great archer, on the lower levels of Switzerland, growing tired of the monotony said to his father, 'I do not like these lowland plains; I'd rather dwell 'mid the avalanche.' This goes to illustrate to some extent the sentiment that binds for life the mountaineer to his native mountain home. SULLOWAY was a fixture in his allegiance to his birthright and his citizenship. If there were richer harvests to be gathered in fields beyond, they had no charms for him. There is a fascination about this mountain life that is irrepressible. I heard it featured once in a memorial poem as it came from the lips of a native-born, home-loving, poet-preacher of New Hampshire who lived it out in love and peace in a life of three score years and ten within a radius of 20 miles from the spot on the mountain side where he was born.

"It was on the 4th day of July, 1863, a day ever memorable for Union victories. It was at the centennial celebration of the town in New Hampshire where my mother and her immediate kindred were born and where our worthy president of this association first saw the light of day. The committee of arrangements had invited one of their native-born townsmen, who had arisen to distinction in a career outside the State, to return to his native heath and trace for them the history of a hundred years.

"Suiting his lines to the occasion, our poet said:

"While I honor the man who comes back with his laurels
All blooming and fresh on the time-wrinkled brow,
From the scenes of debate or national quarrel
To blend with his kindred who follow the plow,
I cherish, I love the true hero who lingers
Life-long at the tomb where his fathers lie,
While the time-god is writing with skeleton fingers
Each scene on the heart as it fades from the eye.
I love the ambition that hovers the highest
To the fount whence our earliest pleasures flow,
Whose flight like the lark's is the surest and highest,
While its home is unseen in the valley below.

"'Paint me as I am,' said Cromwell to his limner. 'When you shall these unlucky deeds relate, speak of me as I am,' said Othello, 'nothing extenuate nor set down aught in malice'

"He who speaks of our dead SULLOWAY just as he was at every stage and turn in life, whether in youth or at the bar, in the legislature or in Congress, is his best eulogist and his truest friend. He may then justly say of him that he was the physical type of a giant race of men; that he was endowed by nature with a well-poised brain, a brave heart, and a genial temperament; that after the manner of America's self-made men, he forged his way upon his own merit from lowly conditions to one of usefulness and fame; that he faced the world until death called him to leave it with an open countenance and an honest hand; that in the drama of life he was never known to play the part of a pretender to advance his private interests or to win public favor; that if he cares to dwell upon his faults or frailties incident to human nature, he will find them condoned by his deeds of love and generosity, and he will find that many of the recipients of his princely charities still remain to bless his name and revere his memory.

"The domain of his personal and political strength lay in the hearts of the common people, they who 'wear their stars not on their breasts but in them.'

"He was familiarly known throughout the State as 'CY SULLOWAY,' or 'CY' for short, not out of disrespect but as a term of endearment. His political friendship reached beyond party lines. I was in Manchester once at a general election when he was running for Congress, and I heard a stalwart Democrat say 'I am a Democrat, dyed-in-the-wool, never cut my ticket, but this time I've got to vote for "CY,"' and so he did.

"I shall do him no injustice when I say that he was not a finished scholar. He did not claim it. His scholastic privileges were limited to the 'little red schoolhouse,' and a few terms at a New England academy. But he became an adept in that volume of human knowledge that was never taught and never learned in schools. Apropos to this, Farragut once wrote to his boy at college, 'Don't take too much time with your books; study men.'

"I can not speak of him, either, as one learned in the law, as the phrase goes. He did not claim it. He had never practiced his profession in the Federal courts so far as I know, but at the bar of his State he was regarded as a safe counselor, was considerate in his charges, and served the poor as faithfully as he served the rich. He was an adroit manager of his cases, and in jury trials especially he was a successful and powerful advocate.

"I can not say, either, that in statecraft he came up to the level of such men in the history of the State and Nation as Langdon and Sullivan, Webster and Woodbury, John P. Hale and GALLINGER, but on the line of public service where he wrought he was equally faithful and equally efficient. He stands to-day at the head of all others in our national legislation in securing from the Treasury just needs of the American soldier, his widow and his orphans, and I am inclined to think that it is upon the strength of his devotion to this cause that his chances of remembrance along the lines of the future largely depend.

"Mr. President, in forming an estimate of our men in public life we are apt to gauge our judgment by our own political proclivities. SULLOWAY was a Republican, and so am I. For myself, I could not pay him a higher tribute if I would. But if we apply the nonpartisan standard of public duty, that which goes to the general welfare, that which involves the integrity of our form of government as fashioned by the fathers, its coordinate powers, and the representative principle upon which it lives and moves and has its being, we shall find that in his fidelity to these essential principles of our national life he was as immovable as the granite hills. Partisan or nonpartisan, he stood foursquare for a tariff wall built up to high-water mark for the protection of American industries and American labor. He was for a navy large enough to police the navigable waters of the globe if need be to protect American commercial and treaty rights, and for an army adequate for the national defense and domestic peace. Judge him, if you will, by any of these tests and you will find him an efficient and faithful public servant.

"This is my epitome of the dead man's life. He was born in my native State of a loving New England mother, in an humble home where life was a struggle for existence, from which condition, unaided by the power of money or social influence, he made his way up against strong resistance to the zenith of his ambition in the American Congress, and died in the Nation's arms, and with stately obsequies she buried him as one of her worthy dead in his native earth beside his kindred dust, there to rest in peace forevermore.

"Well may I say in the presence of his death and the pending crisis amid the nations of the earth, in the language of Byron:

"Between two worlds life hovers like a star,
'Twixt night and morn upon the horizon's edge,
How little do we know that which we are,
How less what we may be.

"The eternal surge of time and tide rolls on
And bears afar our bubbles,
As the old burst new emerges, lashed from the foam of ages,
While the graves of empires heave, but like some passing wave."

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the resolution already adopted the House will now adjourn.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, April 29, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 29, 1918.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 24, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Baird	Hardwick	Nugent	Sterling
Bankhead	Henderson	Overman	Sutherland
Beckham	Hitchcock	Owen	Swanson
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Thomas
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Thompson
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Tillman
Cummins	Kellogg	Poindexter	Townsend
Curtis	Kirby	Pomerene	Trammell
Dillingham	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Fall	Lewis	Shafroth	Walsh
Fernald	Lodge	Sheppard	Warren
Fletcher	McCumber	Sherman	Watson
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Shields	Williams
Gallinger	McLean	Simmons	Wolcott
Gerry	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Gudger	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Hale	New	Smith, Md.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] on account of illness in his family. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. KENDRICK] is unavoidably absent. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained taking part in the third liberty loan campaign.

Mr. GUION. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained from the Senate by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

REGISTRATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate joint resolution 124 for the purpose of requesting a conference with the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and ask a conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of sundry representatives of the anti-suffrage associations of New England and New York remonstrating against the adoption of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FERNALD presented a petition of York Pomona Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Waterboro, Me., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of the Sunday school of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, of Wichita, Kans., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of General Hazen Post, No. 258, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Lincoln, Kans., praying for an increase in pensions to veterans of the Civil War, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the amount of tax on excess war profits, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Preston, Kans., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Diego, Cal., praying for the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 3002) for the relief of the Copper River & Northwestern Railway Co., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 411) thereon.

Mr. VARDAMAN. On the 11th instant I reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads the bill (S. 4208) authorizing postage rates on aeroplane mail. I now submit a report (No. 412) to accompany the bill.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 4456) granting a pension to Sarah J. Strout (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4457) granting an increase of pension to Dennett Cotton (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 4458) to authorize the adoption, registration, and protection of a national trade-mark to distinguish merchandise manufactured or produced in the United States of America and used in commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, or with Indian tribes, and to authorize the Secretary of Commerce to license the use of same, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Patents.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,000,000 toward the necessary additional navy yard on the Pacific coast of the United States, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 3476) to authorize the extension of a spur track or siding from the existing lines of railroad in the District of Columbia across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the buildings occupied by the field medical supply depot of the Army.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the Senator going to speak on the bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has already spoken on the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am speaking on the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no pending amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I speak on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has spoken on the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I spoke on an amendment, and was limited to 20 minutes. I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read a very short article from the New York Times of yesterday, purporting to give the report of the special agent of the President on the aircraft situation, as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We shall have to settle this question. The record shows that the Senator spoke on the bill, and an amendment will have to be offered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will make it all right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I desire to speak on the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of line 19, insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall not extend to the functions, duties, or powers of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. GALLINGER. I propose to address myself briefly to the amendment, but I will allow the Senator from Connecticut to speak first.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As a part of my remarks on the pending amendment I wish the Secretary to read the report of the President's own commission on the aircraft situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the article and was interrupted by

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. There has been so much noise about me that I can not hear what is going on. I simply ask if unanimous consent has been requested to read into the RECORD some clippings from a newspaper?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is being done in the time of the Senator from Connecticut on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I have the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is different. I thought unanimous consent was asked.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am asking the Secretary to read it in order to relieve me of the reading. He is reading it in my own time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the article, which is as follows:

[From the New York Times, Apr. 28, 1918.]

AIR FAILURE A CRIME, BORGLUM DECLARES—PRESIDENT'S INVESTIGATOR SAYS NEARLY A BILLION WAS ABSORBED IN COLOSSAL PROFITEERING—NOT A FIT PLANE PRODUCED—DEMANDS COMPLETE JUDICIAL INQUIRY—SAYS RYAN'S POWER SHOULD EQUAL SCHWAB'S.

"The absorption of 'nearly a billion dollars without the delivery of a serviceable plane' calls for criminal investigation of the acts of members of the Aircraft Board, of men under Chief Signal Officer Squier, and of a ring of aircraft contractors, according to Gutzon Borglum, the special investigator, who was appointed by the President to study the causes of the failure in aircraft production.

"The President's investigator asserts that the conduct of the Aircraft Board in 'corralling contracts' and placing them in the hands of manufacturers, some of whom were utterly unprepared for the work, was 'unfair, unjustified, and, in the Nation's emergency, criminal.' He asserts that Gen. Squier was betrayed by subordinates and that he was imposed upon by a ring of aircraft manufacturers who were guilty of 'colossal profiteering.'

"Mr. Borglum's statement, sent to the New York Times, reads:

"'Gen. Squier is passed at last, as your editorial said to-day, and with the justice that plays no favorite. But with the passing of this official rubber stamp of interests that formed about the colossal appropriation have we cleaned the Augean stables?

RUBBER STAMP OF JUNKERS.

"'The Chief Signal Officer was the official rubber stamp for a group of American junkers, necessary to them to release nearly a billion, which they placed precisely as they in their uninformed advisory capacity chose and distributed to their own or affiliated interests, all to serve a common plan and purpose and all under a contract system so ingenious that it could in time absorb the entire appropriation and not deliver a serviceable plane—and this, in fact, it has largely accomplished. This system that protects the contractor and protects no one else bleeds the Nation and secures that interminable program and delay necessary to develop their product in chief—the motor. No one has indicted this same Chief Signal Officer more severely than I, but in his failure we must not forget that he, too, has been betrayed. He, too, has been the victim of confidence.

"'They and not he invented the mechanical phenomenon of history that has blocked the way, and, around the German Mercedes cylinder, created the greatest obstacle, as it has been the most lucrative mechanical experiment, ever conceived.

"'It was they, with his acquiescence, who camouflaged the Nation and the Government, but it was they who syphoned the Nation's wealth to their respective home towns, and have returned nothing.

"'The methods of the Air Board have been the cause of unjust censure of the national administration by the large available, unemployed manufacturing interests for the board's unfair, unjustified, and, in the Nation's emergency, criminal corralling of contracts which have been let to people who are even at this writing wholly unprepared to fill their contracts. This is not directly chargeable to Gen. Squier.

NO PROPER JUDICIAL INQUIRY.

"'There have been seven separate investigations of the aeronautic conditions, besides two petty reviews of factories related to the manufacture, not counting the special examination of the airplane production spasmodically carried on by Federal intelligence bureaus.

"'There has been no proper judicial inquiry, with power to subpoena, seize, and arrest, by the Federal Government, and there will be in consequence no just apprehension of the real culprits nor real adjustment of improper obligations until such inquiry is instituted. I doubt if machinery exists that can go to the bottom of this entire business. This is too big and necessarily too secret a matter—and should be removed from political influence—for the Senate to handle, nor have they the time or machinery to dig through wagonloads of records, examine thousands of witnesses, nor are they prepared to put the questions necessary to secure answers and so build and rivet a chain of evidence of ignorance, lack of plan, or purpose beyond selfishness and misuse of funds, of general and colossal profiteering, and what is a thousand times worse, of criminal neglect and indifference toward delivery to our troops of necessary war implements they were charged to create, and of constantly and willfully deceiving the President and the country as to the true state of their work.

"'No men free from junker lust can fail to be sad over Squier's failure, but the Nation will demand that those who have betrayed their superior must carry some of the blame. His demotion brings the terror of failure in this war louder and louder in our ears, and the anxious look in fathers' faces is growing set, and they are growing still as the fatal fact repeats itself—the boys have no planes, and we have none to send them.

MUST HAVE SCHWAB'S AUTHORITY.

"'There is no authority yet to give to Mr. Ryan. It is unthinkable that he will be given less authority than Mr. Schwab, or that he will be responsible to anyone but the President and the Nation. Nor must he be bothered or hindered by the actions of the past or asked to solve its wrecks. Some competent special tribunal should be at once created with authority to relieve him, and the rest will be simple.

"'It is not difficult to build planes nor to get engines or create engines, and quantity is but the measure of our almost unlimited and untouched manufacturing facilities. It will be simple, and empty willing hands wait all over the country, if we can but forget gain, personal greed, and profiteering, and everybody build, build, build.'

"Mr. Borglum's special report sent to the President has never been made public."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that article appeared in the New York Times of yesterday. The New York Times is a great American newspaper, and I have the highest respect for it, although it differs in politics from me. It is a sensible, conservative, intellectual paper. I do not think it would intentionally print anything if it thought it was untrue.

Mr. Gutzon Borglum, the author, or reputed author, of that article, is a constituent of mine. He lives in Stamford, Conn. He was formerly a great friend of President Roosevelt—I believe he differed from him in the last campaign—but in my opinion he is a loyal, patriotic American. He has seen me several times in Washington. I know nothing against him personally. I have the highest respect for him, and I have absolute confidence in his loyalty and patriotism.

He told me that the President had given him a written authority, which he could take to the War Department, ordering the War Department to give him access to all the sources of information about our aircraft production. That was several months ago. I think that he had great difficulty in getting access to those sources of information, from what he told me. I think he was more or less obstructed, but he got it; at least, he told me he got it. I thought that his opinions and information were of sufficient importance to warrant their being laid before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. I made appointments with several of the members of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs for Mr. Borglum, in order that he might lay his information before that committee, so that they might investigate it and ascertain whether he was right or wrong.

I do not vouch for the article that has been read into the RECORD; I know nothing about it. I know it has been published broadcast all over the country by a great and highly respectable newspaper, and I know that Mr. Borglum is at hand ready to give any information or to deny or explain or admit. If the situation as to our aircraft production is anything like what is delineated in the blistering words of that article, it behooves this department of the Government—the legislative department of the Government—to take some step to ascertain the truth.

It is asserted in the New York Times—which is a friendly newspaper to the administration and not a hostile critic—that the President appointed this man to make this investigation; that he has made a private report to the President, embracing the charges and allegations contained in that article, and that the President has never made it public. I do not know whether or not the President ought to make it public; I do not know whether or not the article ought to have been written; but I do know that through the Senate Committee on Military Affairs or some committee of the United States Senate, in this world agony, Mr. President, with civilization and the future of the universe at stake, the United States Senate ought to know, or ought to try to know, the truth about these things and ought not longer to be squelched and camouflaged and kept in the dark while we wage a war to make the world safe for democracy and publicity.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. May I address a question to the Senator from Connecticutt?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. You may.

Mr. PHELAN. What is the business or profession of Mr. Borglum?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He is a sculptor.

Mr. PHELAN. An artist?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He is a great sculptor, like St. Gaudens.

Mr. PHELAN. Has he any qualifications to judge of flying machines?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know. The President selected him, and, therefore, I think probably he did not have any qualifications. [Laughter.] I do not know. Let the Senator from California go to his President and find out. I can not find out anything.

Mr. PHELAN. I think it would be an answer, Mr. President, to the Senator from Connecticut to say——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator wants to answer his own question, I have no objection. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. PHELAN. To say that a great artist, as Mr. Borglum is, is principally distinguished for his flights of imagination and no other flights.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not yield to the Senator to make a speech, Mr. President. He wanted to ask me a question, and I have answered it to the best of my ability.

Mr. PHELAN. I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator has said all he desires to say, then I will resume the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I am asking for information. I am informed that this gentleman is the president of some aviation society; at least, that he has had a great deal of experience in aviation matters. I inquire of the Senator from Connecticut if that is true?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know; but it has been intimated to me, Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield to the Senator from Florida in just a moment, but I want to complete my sentence.

It has been intimated to me that some aircraft association or board—whether or not it is the one with which H. D. Baker is connected I do not know—has made some sort of a charge against Mr. Borglum on the ground that he may possibly be interested in aircraft production. I know nothing about it, and I care nothing about it. I want the truth about this situation, and I think the Senate and the people are entitled to it. Now, I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he means to insist upon his statement that the President selected Mr. Borglum to make this investigation?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, no; I have already said that I do not vouch for the article. The New York Times stands responsible for the article. It says the President appointed Mr. Borglum as his own special investigator, and that he has made a private report to the President, which the President has pocketed. That is the statement of the article in the New York Times and not my statement.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Connecticut stated, as I understood, that the President had selected Mr. Borglum to make this investigation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not say any such thing. I said the article stated that the President had selected Mr. Borglum.

Mr. FLETCHER. And I was going to ask the Senator whether he knew that Mr. Borglum applied to the President with the suggestion that he might give information, and the President merely gave him a letter authorizing him to proceed to make such investigation of the matter as he saw fit? That would be a different thing from the President selecting him to make this investigation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will answer the Senator perfectly frankly. I do not want to split words or to cheesepare about this thing; I want to make a perfectly plain, frank statement. Mr. Borglum came to me and said that he had been very much worried about the aircraft production—that was months ago—and he said he was satisfied that the administration was being buncoed by these fellows with their optimism and their prophecies and promises of what they were going to do. As a patriotic American—and he is a Dane, I believe, by blood—he wants to win this war; he is against Germany; he is of a very intense disposition, being a Rooseveltian; he is a fighter; he is not afraid of anybody. He told me he went to lay this information before the President and the President was so impressed with it that he gave him a letter to take over to the War Department ordering the War Department to divulge to him all the contracts, all the information they had about aircraft production. He also stated that he was very much obstructed at almost every process where he tried to find out anything in the War Department. I do not know whether he was wrong or right about it; I am telling you what he told me. That is all I know about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Without reference to the qualifications of this gentleman, the fact is certain that we appropriated $640,000,000 to build aircraft; that there is now before us a bill to appropriate $400,000,000 more, making more than a billion dollars—the entire cost of the Franco-Prussian War as figured by Germany when she imposed that amount of indemnity upon France. We have used that much money and are asked for this additional sum; and what have we got? That is what the American people now want to know. What has become of the money, and where are the assets that are to be placed against the $640,000,000 which we have expended? I should like to have some one upon the Military Affairs Committee or some one in the Senate give us information as to what has been done.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should judge that we have "got it in the neck," Mr. President. [Laughter.] We have got "buncoed."

Mr. McCUMBER. I think so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator wants to know what I think about it; but I can not prove it. I simply feel that way myself.

I am not going to introduce any formal resolution about this matter, for I should immediately be called a traitor or pro-German if I tried to find out anything; but I think, the Committee on Military Affairs, knowing or having reason to believe on the authority of the New York Times that the President of the United States has a secret report in his pocket which divulges a situation such as is outlined by the New York Times, it would not be improper for the Committee on Military Affairs to investigate the matter, unless the President thinks it is incompatible with the public interest or the Democratic Party's interest; I think it would not be improper for us to know about it. Of course, if we can not be trusted to know anything, we had better prorogue ourselves and put this Government in commission and go home; but I think the Committee on Military Affairs ought to take judicial notice of that article and ought to act accordingly.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will be kind enough to suspend for a moment——

Mr. THOMAS. I always suspend for the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask that the proposed amendment which I have sent to the desk be again read, and then I will occupy five minutes, perhaps.

Mr. THOMAS. May I, before the Senator from New Hampshire does that, say a word upon this subject?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. I withhold my request.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent from the Chamber, else I would not assume on behalf of the committee to refer to the so-called Borglum affair. Much of the information outlined in the article just read is already public; some of it is not; but whether that not heretofore stated is true or false may be an open question. I should say, however, for the information of the Senate, that Mr. Borglum and his story are not new to the members of the committee. I think that gentleman, with perhaps the exception of myself, has conferred with all of the members of the committee upon the subject which now appears in the columns of the New York Times. The committee has not so far called Mr. Borglum before it, because from the best information it can obtain Mr. Borglum is not entirely a disinterested witness upon the subject. Our information is also that he represented himself to the President as an authority upon the subject of aviation, which may be true; and if I am not misinformed, as a representative or member of some one of the numerous aeronautic associations of America, and the President gave him the letter to which reference has been made. We have heard, as I have stated——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am utterly ignorant about the statement the Senator has made, to wit, that Mr. Borglum was interested in some one of the several aeronautic associations. Does the Senator mean to intimate that he has any knowledge or information that Mr. Borglum was interested in a financial way in the manufacture of aeroplanes or in anything of that kind or in getting contracts?

Mr. THOMAS. I did not so mean when I said I heard he was identified with one of the aeronautic associations of the country; but, since the Senator has asked that question, I may say that some members of the committee have received information that Mr. Borglum is not entirely disinterested from the standpoint of a potential manufacturer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But is it information, or is it suspicion, or a mere charge?

Mr. THOMAS. I am not at liberty, Mr. President, at this time to give the Senator the source of my information.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I do not want to cross-examine the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope to be able to do so later on, and I would be very glad to tell the Senator privately what I know upon the subject.

What we heard was sufficient to justify us in declining to hear Mr. Borglum, there being so much testimony available to which no question of its character would attach. I am sorry the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is not here.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am here.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator from Nebraska can give more detailed information regarding the attitude of the committee toward Mr. Borglum than I can, because he has seen him on one and on, perhaps, two or three occasions. Had I known the Senator from Nebraska was here, I should not have assumed to speak upon the subject at all, since he is far more competent to do so than am I; but in view of the fact that this article had been laid before the Senate, coupled with the suggestion that the committee should have heard or should now hear Mr. Borglum, I deemed it necessary to say a word upon the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Nebraska desires to speak to the matter that has already been somewhat discussed, I will not call for the reading of the amendment, which relates to an entirely different matter, but will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has stated, the Committee on Military Affairs did not neglect altogether an investigation of the statements made by Mr. Borglum. I had several interviews with Mr. Borglum personally, and I spent an evening with him going over his papers. I believe I can state fairly that he has no valuable information that has not already in some form reached the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. Borglum received in January a letter from the President authorizing him to make certain inquiries and directing officials of the War Department to give him certain facilities for making an investigation. Mr. Borglum endeavored to do so; he gathered a mass of material which was, in my opinion after I had examined it, not very dependable. He advised me at the time that he could place before the committee very definite information if the committee would exercise its power to subpœna witnesses and compel their attendance and the giving of testimony. I told him the committee would be glad to do so if he would furnish the names and addresses of the individuals. Mr. Borglum told me that he would do that thing, but, for some reason or other, although called upon several times, he failed to do it, and I assume that he did not feel sure enough of the information which he said he had, to furnish the names. Had the information been reliable it might have led to criminal prosecution, and if found true it would have reflected upon individuals in public employment at that time. The committee, in view of the fact that Mr. Borglum failed to give the names and addresses of the individuals who might be subpœnaed, did not feel justified in going any further than it did go.

Mr. President, let me also remind the Senate that the committee has investigated this matter and has made a report with a definite recommendation. Also that the recommendation has substantially been adopted by the President. I want to read a paragraph or two from the committee report to the Senate——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. What is the Senator's information about the letter Mr. Borglum obtained from the President? Has it been recalled?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not that I know of.

Mr. WARREN. Has the authority been recalled?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not that I know of. I assume that Mr. Borglum has not been able to lay before the President any information more definite and certain than that which he was able to give to me, and, from my knowledge of the information that the committee had, I knew that such material as he had gathered would not be of any great additional value. The committee was not engaged in an effort to blacken the reputation of any individual; the committee did not want to make a scapegoat of anyone for the partial failure of the aircraft production. The committee was more interested in bringing about a reform of the organization which was in part responsible for the failure of production. So the committee made this recommendation:

> Your committee believes that the production of aircraft should be controlled by one executive officer appointed by the President and responsible to him.

That official the President has since appointed in the person of Mr. Ryan.

> He should be assisted by a corps of the best aircraft engineers and designers possible to obtain, both European and American.

That recommendation has not, so far as I know, been carried out, but we trust that, in the hands of so able a man as Mr. Ryan, a staff of able men will be selected to surround him in this work.

> The matter of production should be taken out of the hands of the Signal Corps entirely.

That practically has been done by the order of the President creating a Division of Aircraft Production, and naming Gen. Charles Kenly, of the War Department, in charge of that, with Mr. Ryan as his adviser. I assume that if the Overman bill passes the matter will be still further concentrated in the hands of a single man or a single board with power to produce aircraft. The trouble in part has been heretofore that power has been vested in one body, and advisory authority in another board, and there has been too much delay and too many debates.

The committee further recommended:

> And no man who has any near or remote interest in a company manufacturing airplanes or engines should be permitted to act as adviser or to be in authority.

That recommendation of the committee was due to the fact that certain information which had come to the committee indicated that certain members of the Aircraft Production Board and others with some authority had possible interests in companies enjoying large contracts. While the committee had no evidence that this had influenced them or had contributed to bring about a failure of aircraft production, the committee felt that there should be no suspicion of that sort, and that hereafter the rule should be adopted that those in authority in the manufacture of aircraft should not in any way, direct or indirect, have an interest in the production of aircraft.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. The recommendations, of course, are very good and so self-evident that we can hardly understand why it would be necessary even to make such recommendations to the proper department; but it seems to me that the particular thing we are all interested in, and which I hope the Senator, while he is on his feet, will tell the American people, is, What have we got to-day for the expenditure of $640,000,000? Has the money been burned up? Have some profiteers picked the pockets of the American public and taken that money and given no return? Have we got a single machine, or what have we got to represent this enormous expenditure of $640,000,000?

The public are asking this question. We would like to know what our assets are in the shape of machines.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, my recollection of the figures is that something like $50,000,000 has been expended in the purchase of property, including the fields upon which are located the various schools for aviation. Some of that, I regret to say, has been unwisely expended. The evidence also showed, and this report shows, that something like 3,500 machines for training purposes have been constructed, and most of them are or have been in operation. The evidence also shows that we have graduated about 2,000 aviators from the primary training schools. Some of them have had final training, or advanced training, and are actually flying in France at the present time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Are they paid out of this fund?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is the Senator certain about that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not certain; I assume it; but they certainly have been educated; and the expense of the education, the construction of the fields, the construction of the airplanes, the hangars, and all of the construction has come out of this fund.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the men themselves are enlisted men, and they must be paid out of another fund.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I presume so. I am not claiming that their salaries have been paid; but the expense of educating them, and the expense of the construction of these two or three thousand machines have been paid out of this fund.

When it comes to combat planes the committee reported very frankly that we had, in the year, met with failure. Only one combat plane had been made and shipped to France. Another combat plane had been manufactured and was burned up the day of its first flight. But an immense amount of money has been expended in the construction of plants for the manufacture of airplanes; an immense amount of money has been expended in gathering materials; an immense amount of money has been and is now invested in planes in a state of partial manufacture; and the committee expressed itself frankly as disappointed with the manufacture of combat planes and stated the reason for the failure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When we went into this war we were in our infancy in airplane manufacture. The other nations were three or four years ahead of us. It would have been the proper thing to do, and the committee so states, for us to have taken the patterns which other nations had succeeded with, and to have proceeded with the manufacture of airplanes of the types that were then in use in Europe. It would have been the proper part for our Aircraft Production Board to have manufactured engines which were in successful operation in Europe. But the board made the great mistake of deciding to put all of our eggs in one basket, and decided to manufacture a so-called liberty motor which would take in its development, as has now been discovered, a year, and we neglected meanwhile to manufacture the airplanes and the engines which had already met with success in Europe.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him another question? Could we not in the beginning have contracted with the great manufacturers of automobiles scattered all over the United States and set many of them, like the Ford Co., to the production of airplanes?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We could have engaged in the manufacture of successful European engines and successful European aircraft; but the Aircraft Board decided that it would have everything American, and it was not until the late fall of last year that they discovered their mistake, and then proceeded to undertake the manufacture of European airplanes and engines in this country. We are now trying to manufacture the Bristol Fighter, the De Haviland machine, and the Handley Page, which is the great bombing machine of Great Britain. We began too late, unfortunately. We should have begun last May. We did not actually begin the manufacture of European machines until this winter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask the Senator a question. By way of general preamble I may say that there is very little difference between manufacturing a machine and buying it, if the machine is all right. I want to ask the Senator how many combat machines we have bought that were manufactured in France and how many combat machines we have bought that were manufactured in Great Britain, because I do not want the country to rest under the impression that we have only one combat machine in Europe.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We have contracted for a large number, but it would be contrary to the public interest for me to state how many have been delivered. I will say that the number is distressingly small. France has not been able to deliver them; Italy has not been able to deliver them, apparently because we did not keep our contract for the supply of raw materials; and although Great Britain is turning out 100 battle planes a day she is only able by that means to make up her wastage, so that she has not been able to deliver battle planes to us.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I saw in one of the magazines—Current Literature, I think—that we had ordered several hundred planes that had been manufactured by France, or in France, and delivered to us in France.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is a mistake, I am sorry to say; and a great many of the publications that have been put out, I regret to say by authorized authority, in the United States have been gross exaggerations, calculated utterly to mislead the American people, and for a long time they misled the committee. I could tell the Senator, and I will in private, how many machines we actually have flying in France to-day. They are of French manufacture, and they are not the first-rate combat machines at that, because France has need of all her own combat machines over her own lines.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would it be out of order for me to ask the Senator whether we have over 100 of them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It would not be out of order to ask, but——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the Senator consider that he had no right to answer the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should regret to give the answer, and I think the Senator would be disappointed with it if given.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Germans undoubtedly know how many we have. Why should not the American people know? What reason is there for keeping the information from us?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not want to take the responsibility of stating the number. We have not any authority to give the information. It was given to us in confidence.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, then, I will not ask the Senator to state it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say that the report of this committee was not designed to make bad matters worse. The report of this committee was designed to bring about a reform, or to help in bringing about a reform, that the President was engaged in, and we believe it has helped. We believe that the action taken by the President already will go far to bring about a reform, and that even at the present time new energies and strong abilities have been put to work to make up for the lost time. Previous preparation is not altogether lost. We have a great deal of material on hand. We have great factories that are now engaged in the work.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator explain just one statement he made a moment ago, when he said that we should have begun our work of construction in May, but that we really did not begin it until December? What was the real reason for this delay at such a critical period in the history of this war?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Aircraft Production Board labored under the delusion that we could bring about a miracle in the United States; that we could in the twinkling of an eye, or within a few months, design and create machines which are necessarily the result of a long process of development. They thought, and they said, that they could produce a Liberty motor in four months, and it has taken them a year. That was one reason why they depended upon this new American engine instead of taking any one of the four or five successful European machines. It was a mistaken policy. The board has been ousted from power by the President, a new head has been put in it, and I think no useful purpose can be subserved by going into the details any further than I have already done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask it purely for information. I understand that a statement was made a few evenings ago before the National Press Association to the effect that large quantities of the so-called Liberty motor had been ordered by the British Government, and were being used by them, and large quantities by the French Government. I should like to ask the Senator if that is true?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A large number of orders for Liberty motors have been placed, but, of course, they are subject to test. We are not absolutely confident that those motors will stand the tests. The Liberty motor apparently is likely to be a machine about equivalent, and perhaps a little superior when finally developed, to the RollsRoyce Eagle engine, the great bombing engine of England, a machine weighing over 800 pounds, and having something like 400 horsepower. We believe it will be equivalent to that machine, but it has not quite attained that yet. We are under contract to deliver these machines to Great Britain and France and Italy also, but they have got to stand the tests when delivered.

Mr. NORRIS. They have not got them quite so that they will stand the tests yet?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We have some Liberty motors which are successfully operating in this country, and we have some which have failed; and, as the committee said, they are practically just emerging from the experimental state.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask my colleague another question. Do they or do they not expect to use the Liberty motor in the combat machines?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In the bombing machines, yes; and bombing machines are combat machines. In the single-seaters; no. The single-seater is a battle machine which must have a light powerful engine. The Liberty motor is a heavy powerful engine.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think I was quite explicit in my question. When I said "combat machine," I meant the machine that goes into the air as a fighting machine, to fight other airplanes. Do they use the Liberty motor in those machines?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bombing machine fights other airplanes, but——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. Is this debate on the amendment that is pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina is well aware that anybody can say anything in the United States Senate on any subject.

Mr. OVERMAN. But we are acting under a unanimous-consent agreement now.

Mr. NORRIS. No; we are not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The discussion is really on airplanes, but it is legally on the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that. I thought perhaps more than 20 minutes had expired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair will keep the Senator's time.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask another question while I am on my feet. Are we now manufacturing bombing planes in this country?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are beginning to.

Mr. NORRIS. Are we manufacturing them to such an extent that the output is considerable, and to what extent?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We have turned out a few De Haviland machines, and we have a large number of Handley Page machines in course of manufacture; also some Bristol Fighters coming on.

Mr. NORRIS. Those are the English and the French machines?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Those are the machines which the Senator said he thought we ought to have commenced to manufacture at the beginning of the war?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are.

Mr. NORRIS. How many of those have we manufactured?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We have only sent one to Europe so far.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have here a very interesting article published by the New York World, whose unfailing fidelity to the President I think no one can question. I will not ask to have it all read. It was published on April 9, with large headlines. It is largely a statement of Mr. Morgan, who has been until recently vice president of the Curtiss Co., in which he gives a very interesting explanation of the delays that have occurred, and why they have occurred—the constant cancellation of contracts, and the constant, endless changes and improvements emanating from Washington. Perhaps the moral of it is contained in one sentence. He says that the Curtiss Co.—

are making flying boats in large quantities for our Navy and the British—and the Navy, Mr. Morgan explained, does not tinker. It decided on a model and stuck to it. The result is it is getting its flying boats.

Mr. President, I will not delay the Senate by asking to have this article read, but I will ask that it may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ARMY COULD HAVE 1,000 WAR PLANES, BUT HAS NOT; WHY?—W. A. MORGAN, LATE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE CURTISS CO. AND PRODUCTION EXPERT, TELLS—"CHANGE, CHANGE, CHANGE" BY A BOARD THAT NEVER SEEMED TO KNOW WHAT IT WANTED.—MIGHT HAVE BEEN SHIPPING 500 PLANES A MONTH NOW.—COSTLY PLANT AND 11,000 MEN, EAGER TO GO AHEAD WITH BRISTOL FIGHTERS, PARALYZED BY INDECISION AT WASHINGTON AS TO MOTORS, GUN MOUNTS, GUNS, EVERYTHING.

About a week ago a pursuit airplane of the type known as the Bristol Fighter, a two-seated gun-mounting machine made from an English design by the Curtiss Aeroplane Co. of Buffalo, N. Y., made a test flight at that city.

Of its capabilities nothing much was made public. The machine upon landing was accidentally destroyed by fire. But the plane's exact capabilities—and its destruction—are not so important as the state of affairs revealed by the appearance of this single machine. And that state of affairs, the World is assured on excellent authority, is this:

"CHANGE, CHANGE, CHANGE."

The Curtiss Co. could have, and would have, completed by this month no less than 1,000 pursuit machines were it not for the policy of "change, change, change" insisted upon by the Aircraft Production Board at Washington.

Instead of having one pursuit machine at Buffalo, wrecked, the company could have finished and shipped them by the hundreds upon hundreds, literally to swarm in the air over the battle sectors held by our soldiers. It could be turning them out now at the rate of 500 a month, with increasing productivity as time passed. But the Aircraft Production Board from week to week, from month to month, changed its plans.

It changed its motors, it changed its gun mounts, it changed its guns, its instruments—there were literally hundreds of abrupt alterations in design.

These assertions which The World quotes are made by William Arthur Morgan, of Buffalo, who was vice president and production expert for the Curtiss Co. until last month, when he resigned, broken in health and disgusted in spirits by the long strain of waiting, waiting, waiting for a chance to carry out one of the biggest jobs of the war.

At Atlantic City, where Mr. Morgan is convalescing, he told a World reporter yesterday the story of his experience with the Aircraft Board during the time he was with the Curtiss concern—and an unusual story it was.

A word about William A. Morgan. For 22 years he was with Swift & Co., the Chicago packers, latterly handling $25,000,000 worth of business annually. He became president of the Buffalo Copper & Brass Rolling Mill at the outbreak of the war and built it up from a business of $1,500,000 in 1914 to $60,000,000 in 1916, when the American Brass Co. bought it in. Mr. Morgan is a big production man, thoroughly used to handling immense projects.

He made several million dollars for himself out of the copper and brass mill and therefore had no financial interest in getting into the airplane business. But when offered the vice presidency of the Curtiss Co. he accepted for patriotic reasons. He thought he could best do his bit for America by helping to get out part of the "enormous fleet" of airplanes which the Government talked enthusiastically about soon after we entered the war. Mr. Morgan arranged to give—and did give—his Curtiss salary to the Red Cross.

MR. MORGAN'S STORY.

"I joined the Curtiss Co. on July 16 last," Mr. Morgan said. "After sizing up the possibilities of the concern and talking to its staff of experts we went to Washington and consulted with the Aircraft Board as to the number of airplanes we could turn out. We figured conservatively that we could produce 3,000 pursuit planes and 1,000 bombers from January 1 to July 1, 1918. The members of the board said that if the $640,000,000 appropriation for our air service went through they would give us a contract for that number of machines.

"At that time, understand, the appropriation had not yet gone through. But, relying on the word of the board, we hurried back to Buffalo, where I had taken an option on a piece of land, and closed for it. The land and the necessary buildings for the work we purposed to do cost about $5,500,000. The Curtiss Co. was not in a position to swing such a big deal, and so I personally went out and borrowed $4,000,000 from a banking house. We got busy and began putting our buildings up within a few days. We had to send to Canada for some of the steel, but we got it into the country cheaper than we could have bought it here.

"Erection work was begun on July 27, and by September 15 we had 540,000 square feet of space. And up to this time we did not have the contract. I was staking everything on the word of the Aircraft Board.

CONTRACT SIGNED, THEN CANCELED.

"The contract was signed on September 19. It was changed a little, so that it ordered 3,000 pursuit machines—fighting machines—and 500 heavier bombers. By November 2 we completed a second building and had a total of 1,170,000 square feet of space. We were ready to go ahead with our job—a $30,000,000 contract.

"But on November 7 last they canceled the whole contract. This was because of the first of the many, many changes in design. The pursuit plane that we were to build was a copy of a certain French machine, a very good fighting plane, which is still good enough to be in use in considerable numbers by the French. It was a single seater.

"But it seems that the Kaiser had sent some two-seaters over Verdun; that is, machines from which the pilot fired from the front and his companion had a second gun which he could fire at any plane which was chasing him. So the Aircraft Board immediately countermanded our order and set about to get a two-seater design. They accepted the Bristol, which is an English machine.

"We could have turned out the original plane ordered of us in great quantities very quickly. We could have begun production in December and got into quantity production in January, perhaps at the rate of 500 a month. We could have turned out any sort of plane they wanted, even the Bristol Fighter, at that rate; but we could not get the definite 'go-ahead.'

"My own belief is that it would have been far better to have made some of the original type; to have had 1,000 of them over there now protecting our lines, rather than to have none over there. We can't fight with designs. We have to fight with actual planes."

It is Mr. Morgan's estimate that the Curtiss Co. lost $500,000 a month through lack of production, beginning with that month of November and continuing up to date. The concern should have been making other machines and increased shipments from January, 1918, of $350,000 to nearly $400,000 in December, 1918, and has been obliged to increase its inventory from $2,000,000 to $11,000,000.

A COMPLETE HALT.

"Naturally, there was a complete halt when our contract was canceled, but to make up for this cancellation the board sent us word to go ahead and build 600 planes of the 'advanced training type.' This is a two-seated, dual-control machine, which I may not describe in detail. But we showed them, with this 'plane,' what we could do in the way of production. We had a sample finished and in the air within 10 days, and I believe the 600 have all been turned out and shipped by now.

"Finally, we got our order for the Bristol Fighters. The contract was for 2,000.

"From the very beginning we were never able to get a definite 'go-ahead' order so we could rush the production of this machine. We were, it must be remembered, maintaining immense overhead expenses. I personally was morally responsible for a $4,000,000 loan. Not that I cared so much about that. I'd give every cent I have to be able to feel that we'd turned out a great quantity of machines; that they were protecting our fighters; and that I had aided in doing this as my contribution toward winning the war.

"Well, on November 22 the executive committee of the Curtiss Co. wrote a strong letter to the Aircraft Board and told them that we were not responsible for any delays there had been, and that on account of these delays, which were not our fault, we felt that the Government should finance our operations—at least those extensions which we had made. This they agreed to do, and in January they took up our $4,000,000 mortgage.

HUNDREDS OF CHANGES.

"The changes that the board ordered in the Bristol Fighter were literally hundreds. Their first great difficulty was about a motor. They decided primarily to use the Liberty eight-cylinder, which, as is now known, has been entirely discarded, but they found that would not fit in the Bristol. Then they decided upon a certain type of French motor, and then upon another type of French motor of greater power.

"These changes, of course, caused important changes in the machine, its balance, and so on. Then they could not seem definitely to decide upon what sort of machine gun to use. They would order one kind, then another, then revert to the first again.

"This necessitated alterations in the machine proper and alterations in the gun mounts. Then a certain sort of instrument would be ordered, abandoned, and another type ordered and abandoned. We never knew where we were—and here was a force of 11,000 men literally straining at the leash, ready to give all their strength and skill to the job of fast production."

Mr. Morgan personally bought $150,000 in liberty bonds, and offered these at the rate of $2,500 a week as prizes to the department showing the greatest efficiency. He had gathered this army of men and was receiving from 300 to 1,000 applications a day from others who wanted to be in on the big production job. But the big production job was virtually stalled.

"Any idea that reached here from abroad was seized by those in charge of our air program," Mr. Morgan said. "It was a case of constantly copying something. In our air program, I have found, no encouragement is given to American companies and American designers to produce something of their own.

"I do not want to appear to be holding a brief for the Curtiss Co. alone. I know that all the others have had the same experience, but I do want to stick up for the American manufacturer in general, and I want to assert that we Americans can—and will, if we are permitted—turn out as good airplanes as Germany does, and a great many more than Germany can turn out. We can produce enough to blind the Kaiser's armies if the authorities will let us go ahead.

NO TRICK TO DO IT.

"It is no trick to turn out airplanes by the thousands—and I believe they will win the war—if the authorities will only decide what they want. But they hadn't the last I heard."

"What is the remedy for the situation?" Mr Morgan was asked.

"Stop tinkering and let the manufacturers alone," he replied. "As Mr. McNab, of the President's investigating committee, is quoted as saying the other day, if the authorities want to tinker, let them get a big tract of land down in Virginia and tinker to their heart's content. Meanwhile the manufacturers will be producing."

"There are between 12,000 and 15,000 men at the Curtiss Buffalo plant," Mr Morgan said, "but they are not proceeding with anything like the efficiency they are capable of. They are making flying boats in large quantities for our Navy and the British—and the Navy," Mr. Morgan explained, "does not tinker. It decided on a model and stuck to it. The result is it is getting its flying boats. The company has an order for those which will run several months yet."

But, the former vice president asserted vigorously, it should long ago have been giving its best energies to the battle planes, and there should be at least 1,000 of that type protecting our soldiers in France.

Mr. Morgan was not able to say when the Bristols will begin to appear in appreciable numbers. His health gave way in January because of the strain he had been under, and he went to California. Returning, he resigned from the Curtiss Co. March 1.

Mr. Morgan is strongly in favor of a separate Government department, with its own officers, to take hold of the situation, get down to business in a hurry, and turn out planes instead of only designs.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, recalling the Senate to the amendment that I submitted a moment ago, I will ask that it be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of line 19, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall not extend to the functions, duties, or powers of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have submitted that amendment on behalf of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who on yesterday was called out of the city in consequence of the illness of a son. Over the telephone he asked me if I would, in his name, submit the amendment, and call attention to some observations that he made in a very elaborate speech that he made in the Senate on March 12 and 13, 1912, when the so-called public printing bill was under discussion.

I am a member of the Committee on Printing, but not a member of the Joint Committee on Printing, which consists, as I remember it, of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. The Joint Committee on Printing has jurisdiction over the affairs of the Government Printing Office. They, as I understand it, test the paper and purchase the paper and give out contracts for the delivery of paper to that great establishment. They have technical knowledge, and I know from my association with those Senators upon the Committee on Printing on the part of the Senate, they have been very diligent in seeing to it that the interests of the Government are carefully safeguarded in every important particular, even in the most minute particulars, as far as the administration of that great office is concerned.

It has occurred to me, having some knowledge of the printing business myself, or I did have in early life, and from the information I have gleaned as a member of the Committee on Printing, that there are more reasons why this establishment should be exempted from the operation of the bill than have been presented, and they have been very ably presented for the exemption of certain other instrumentalities of the Government.

The Senator from Utah, when the printing bill to which I have called attention was under consideration, discussed the matter very elaborately and learnedly, and I am going to ask that the Secretary read two brief extracts which I have marked, one on page 5 and the other on page 8 of the speech to which I have alluded. These are extracts from the speech of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

From the very foundation of the Government Congress has insisted on direct supervision over the public printing and binding. The Public Printer was for many years called the "Congressional Printer," and the Government Printing Office was established primarily for the work of Congress and only incidentally for that of the other branches of the Government. Congress has never relinquished its control over this work, and I doubt if it ever will. It is absolutely essential that the Government Printing Office should be immediately responsive to the wishes and needs of Congress, or else that publicity which is vital to good government could not be insured the people of the country.

* * * * * * *

As a consequence of the failure of the contract system the Government, in 1860, purchased a private printing plant for the sum of $135,000, "with the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing," as directed by joint resolution of June 23, 1860. The building in which this plant was located is still a part of the Government Printing Office, being located at the corner of H and North Capitol Streets. That was the beginning of the Government Printing Office. The original investment of $135,000 in this plant has grown to approximately $8,000,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to delay the Senate in discussing this matter. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will accept the amendment. If not, I trust that the Senate will vote in favor of the amendment. This is a business institution. It is a great workshop, the greatest in the world of its kind, and I think it would be a very great mistake to pass over even to the President of the United States the authority to disturb its operations. It is being administered in a very careful way, as economically as it can be under the circumstances, and it is being administered especially under the direction of a joint committee of this and the other body, and in the supervision of the work of that institution the appropriations that are being made for that institution are so well guarded and cared for that I can not conceive any good could possibly come in even giving authority to interfere with it in any way.

Mr. President, I might talk an hour on this subject, because I have studied it pretty carefully; but I, in common with the Senator in charge of the bill and in common with the Senate in a general way, am anxious that the measure which is now before the Senate should be disposed of, and for that reason I shall content myself with the few words that I have uttered.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the Joint Committee on Printing is composed of an equal number of Members of the House and Senate, and at this time I happen to be chairman of that committee. I see no necessity whatever for the exemption of the Government Printing Office in the operation of the powers granted thus far in the bill before the Senate. It is true we buy all the print paper that the Congress of the United States uses and we exercise the care of which the Senator has spoken.

The Government Printing Office to-day, it is fair to say, does millions of dollars worth of printing outside the orders of the Joint Committee on Printing. It would be impossible for the Joint Committee to supervise the furnishing of the necessary paper that goes before that office every day in the year. The result is that the executive department of the Government itself makes such an enormous demand on that department and in such exigent matters at times that the Committee on Printing can not supervise it, because that department of the Government has contracts and agreements with the print-paper makers of the country at a price much less than we have found it able to get as a bid from the print-paper people. The result is that in other branches that have to have printing done in the greatest printing office to-day in the world the work is done largely through private contract at less prices for the paper than we have been able to obtain.

I think by excluding the Government Printing Office from the operation of the bill we may very seriously limit the effectiveness of many war measures. Therefore I, as a member of the committee, aside from that as a Member of the Senate, would anyhow oppose this particular exclusion from the powers granted in the bill. The powers of the bill even are nothing to compare with the powers heretofore granted the President in other matters. Why we should make an exception and the Printing Office, that does four times as much printing for the departments as it is doing for Congress, should be excluded from its operations I am not able to see. I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator is he sure of his figures when he says the Printing Office is doing four times as much business for the executive department of the Government as for Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. No; I am glad the Senator called my attention to it. When I said four times, I was merely making an estimate of what I observed coming before the committee. I was probably not by any means correct in that statement.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But certainly there is an enormous amount of it done. I think more than is done under purely congressional contracts.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I regard the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire as unnecessary and as probably proposing something that would be harmful. There is not, of course, any possibility of the President interfering with the operations of the Government Printing Office under the authority given in the bill. There is a possibility of his interfering with other bureaus or other departments that are having printing done outside the Government Printing Office and ordering it all to be done in the Government Printing Office, and I think that ought to be done wherever it is possible. I think the Government printing ought to be done at the Government Printing Office, the one plant established by the Government, and not in various basements and side offices of departments and bureaus, as they may see fit to order printing done. It ought to be done by the Government at the Government plant—the Government Printing Office.

The bill would allow the President to transfer these bureaus and coordinate the whole printing business in the Government Printing Office, which would be a very desirable thing to do.

If the Senator's amendment should be adopted, it might interfere with the existing law, under which the President can fix the price of news-print paper at the Government Printing Office. We had up the question some time ago, at the time when I preceded my friend the Senator from Arizona as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing, involving the price of news-print paper. We had a contract of 2½ cents a pound for that paper. The manufacturers decided after awhile that they wanted 3 cents a pound. They made a demand for that price. The Public Printer, in an effort to supply the news-print paper required at the Government Printing Office, himself undertook to get a lower figure, and that was refused. We referred the matter to the Federal Trade Commission. They investigated the situation and reported back that 2½ cents a pound, at the present price, under present conditions, with the cost of labor and of material and all that, would give the manufacturers a profit of 8 to 10 per cent on their business. We undertook to reason with the manufacturers and plead with them as a matter of patriotism in these circumstances to let us have the paper at 2½ cents a pound. They declined. Prices were going up; they did not know, if they undertook to make a contract at 3 cents, what might happen, and they did not want to make that for any great extension of time, that we feared there would be pretty soon a demand for 3½ cents. Thereupon we appealed to the President and expressed the view that under the act which had been previously passed by Congress he had the authority to fix the price of the paper. The President referred the matter to the Attorney General, who held that he had, and thereupon he ordered the price fixed, and at the price which the Federal Trade Commission had found upon inquiry and investigation was a fair and reasonable price and allowed the manufacturers a fair and reasonable profit—2½ cents a pound. So we are operating now under that order of the President fixing the price of news-print paper at 2½ cents a pound. If this amendment is adopted, it might take away from the President that very authority and power which he is now exercising.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, if the President is exercising it and it is not called in question, how on earth could this take that power away from him, if he has it now?

Mr. FLETCHER. Because the Senator would add to the bill a provision that this authority to coordinate bureaus and redistribute functions should be denied to the President in regard to the Printing Office.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is not the position the Senator took. The Senator said that it would interfere with the President fixing the price. The Senator is mistaken about that, of course.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know how far it might extend. It might be held that it limited the authority and power of the President by putting it in this bill, so that he could not exercise the authority he now has with reference to the Government Printing Office. My remark referred not only to the mere matter of fixing the price, but I was using that as an illustration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not rather be held, if it is considered the President has ample power over it already, it is not necessary to put it in this bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am afraid not. Here the proviso is offered that such authority shall not extend to the Government Printing Office. Putting that into this bill, it might be held, being subsequent to the authority we have already given, that it might perhaps limit that authority and exclude the Government Printing Office from the exercise of the authority by the President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the Senator really think this bill covers the Government Printing Office, anyway?
